CHAPPELL PIANOS.

Used by the World's Greatest Artists.

Bachhaus says: "I cannot speak too highly of the brilliant and sympathetic tone and responsive touch. You need fear no rival."

Dr. Richard Strauss says: "I consider the tone of a remarkably sweet and sympathetic quality and of unusual sustaining power, the touch very responsive and light. Having always been used to pianos of German make, it was a great and agreeable surprise to me to find such a perfect instrument of British manufacture."

If your difficulty is PLAYING AT SIGHT

you should study the EHREMYER System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing. This is the only method which enables pianists of all degrees of proficiency to play at first sight all music that lies within their technical powers.

The System is not only approved by professional musicians, but has the enthusiastic approval of the hundreds of pupils who have taken the course.

CROTCHETS.

One description of crotchets is indispensable in music, but another sort is most dangerous when applied to practical playing or teaching. Isolated crotchets and fads can never, by being placed together, form a system, whereas for the complicated problems involved in playing a musical instrument, system is of paramount importance, as witness the frequent failures on ordinary tuition. Macdonald Smith's Method is free from crotchets and isolated notions. Its fundamental principles have stood the test of time, and its practical results are frequently described as "miraculous," "magical," &c. In "Light on Pianoforte Playing," sent free by Mr. Macdonald Smith, the principles on which his well-known System is based are fully described.

A FINE MODERN VIOLIN.

MADE ENTIRELY BY W. E. HILL AND SONS.

OUR Instruments have for long been recognised as among the finest examples of modern work, and we are now producing at a moderate price an excellent Violin, constructed upon models founded on the most perfect types of the great schools.

These Violins are made throughout in our workshops. None but carefully-selected and seasoned material, and highly skilled workmanship, are employed in their construction; and particular attention is given to the accurate fitting and regulation of each instrument.

PRICE £12 10S.

SOLD BY W. E. HILL & SONS,
Sole Violin and Bow Makers to H.M. THE KING,
AT THEIR PLACE OF BUSINESS,
140 NEW BOND STREET,
LONDON, W.

RELIABILITY

The reputation of a Brinsmead is as great abroad as at home, the reliability of these famous British Pianos being such that, no matter how drastic climatic conditions may be—whether tropical heat or arctic cold must be withstood—the instrument retains its fine, distinguishing qualities unimpaired.

A thoroughness in the selection of only the perfect material, a painstaking exactitude in the workmanship, and a scrupulous co-ordination of innumerable parts into the harmonious whole—these define the reliability, and account for the Brinsmead reputation. Though the firm's manufactures vary in price from the most costly to that which is within reach of everybody, this reputation has not been, and never will be, imperilled by scamped workmanship or carelessness in selecting materials.

"BRINSMEAD" MEANS RELIABILITY.

Write to Dept. 32 for the New Brinsmead Catalogue, containing full particulars of the firm's latest Models. It will be sent post-free, together with the name and address of the local agent.

DR. ARNE

AND

RULE, BRITANNIA

BY

WILLIAM HAYMAN CUMMINGS.

PREFACE.

The glorious National Song, "Rule, Britannia," is familiar to the whole British race; nevertheless, very few men and women are acquainted with the history of its birth and parentage.

In the following pages I have endeavoured to chronicle all the facts which are discoverable by diligent research, and to present them in an attractive and entertaining manner.

The life of Dr. Arne, the composer of "Rule, Britannia," offers to the reader and to the music student an interesting and instructive story, showing that natural ability, even when combined with genius, is not sufficient to ensure a triumphant and successful career. Morality and conscientious rectitude in the affairs of life are essential, and had Arne exercised these, his exceptional gifts might have enabled him to surpass his great contemporary, Handel.

It only remains to be noted that many letters and documents are here printed for the first time, some of them copied from the original autographs in my possession. They illuminate much which has hitherto been obscure and uncertain in the career of a famous composer.

THE SHAKESPEARE AND MUSIC
BIRTHDAY BOOK

BY

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE, C.V.O.

This unique book should be in the possession of all lovers of Poetry and Music, and should be especially appreciated by those music-lovers who wish to possess the autograph of musicians, each "day" being furnished not only with a charming musical quotation from our greatest poet, but also with a stave on which may be written a few bars of music.

Incidentally, it may be pointed out that the book has a persuasively educational value, in that each quotation appears in the original English and also in an idiomatic German translation.

It is one of the best possible gifts for musical young people.

MICHAEL BALLING.

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

JANUARY 1, 1913.

MR. MICHAEL BALLING.

Mr. Michael Balling, the successor to Dr. Hans Richter as conductor of the Hallé Orchestra in Manchester, has during the past month shown himself a strong man of affairs, and entirely changed the aspect of musical life in that city. Not only has he already broken through the conservative musical policy to which the Hallé Society had during Dr. Richter's conductorship become more and more attached, but he has now also prevailed upon a committee, which has long thought it a duty, and almost an ideal, to preserve a square balance-sheet, to adopt an artistic policy that may involve the Society in an estimated loss of £1,000 on each season of twenty concerts, and an alteration of its articles of association in consonance with this policy. The guarantors, many of whom have hitherto regarded it as a hardship to supply even the smallest portion of their guarantee, have not only confirmed the new policy of the committee, but have suggested that the whole amount of their guarantee should, in cases where it is found convenient, be placed in the hands of the Society and funded, to make by means of the interest accruing, permanent provision for the additional expenditure. The musical advantages will be many. Contrary to previous custom, choral works will now have a combined rehearsal for choir and orchestra; there will be an additional orchestral rehearsal for each concert; and the members of the Orchestra will be put on a salary during the winter months. There will also shortly be an endeavour to found an 'Operatic Festival Society' in connection with the Orchestra, and to inaugurate a series of orchestral concerts for the poorer classes, with the aid of the municipality. Mr. Balling has ventured to disturb Manchester's well-known satisfaction with itself in musical matters, and wounded where it had most pride. Manchester is now stirring to vindicate its own opinion of itself.

Mr. Balling has thus become a power in English musical life. His previous career has also an interest for English musicians, beyond its personal interest. He was born at Heidingsfeld, near Würzburg, in Bavaria, in August, 1866, at the time the battle around Würzburg was raging between the Bavarians and the Prussians. Owing to this turmoil the date of his birth is uncertain. His mother held he was born on the 27th; his father thought it the 26th; the baptismal register gives the 29th. His parents were poor. His father was a lithographer in the employ of the Government, at £4 per month, and had also a small grocery business, looked after chiefly by his wife. Balling was the youngest of six children, and his father died when he was twelve years old. He went only to the village school, and was intended first for a shoemaker. But he had a good contralto voice as a boy, and his singing was admired in the Catholic Church, which he, with his parents, attended. The schoolmaster therefore advised that he should be trained for music, and he obtained entrance as a free student at the Würzburg Royal School of Music. Here he studied the viola with Hermann Ritter, who was seeking to restore the older and larger form of viola as made by Antonio Bagatello. Ritter, who taught not only the viola but the history of music, and was the author of several important social pamphlets, sowed also the first seeds of idealism in the boy's mind. With Ritter he studied for four years, and was awarded a viola of the Italian model as a prize from King Ludwig II. His first position was as viola-player in the Mainz Municipal Orchestra, conducted by Emil Steinbach, brother of Fritz Steinbach, and in some ways Mr. Balling thinks an even finer musician. He worked hard in untimely hours to pass the examination that would exempt him from two of his three years' military service, and succeeded. He obtained the necessary position that would technically give him a secure livelihood as viola-player in the Schwerin Court Orchestra. About this time he had the honour of playing Rubinstein's Viola sonata, esteemed by Rubinstein as the best of all his chamber-music, in public with the composer. At Schwerin he met Carl Hill, the first Alberich of Bayreuth, who brought him into touch, to his great delight, with the prose works of Wagner. A pupil of Nietzsche and a pupil of Heinrich von Stein also at this period influenced his mind strongly towards the study of philosophy, and his nature developed quickly. He met Brahms, and played much chamber-music with him, and also with Aloys Schmidt, of pedagogic fame. His first experience of conducting was obtained here, in connection with the choir and orchestra of the Protestant Cathedral, where he found great delight in the Motets of Bach and other church music. During his one year of military duty, work was sometimes severe. One day he was at military exercise at 4 a.m.; rehearsing the viola solo of 'Harold in Italy' with the orchestra at 11; back to the barracks at 2 until 6; and in evening-dress ready to begin the solo with the orchestra at 7. From Schwerin he obtained his first invitation to join the Bayreuth Orchestra. He was its youngest member, and when, on no one starting a viola solo in 'Tristan,' he began, the conductor (Mottl) so much admired his playing that he placed him at the leader's desk. He was asked to play also at Madame Wagner's soirée, Mottl accompanying him. He played the 'Romance Oubliée' of Liszt, as arranged by the composer for Hermann Ritter. Here he met Lévi, Richter, Hans von Wolzogen, Humperdinck, Kienzl, and other famous musicians.

Through the influence of friends in Hamburg he was next invited to go to New Zealand in place of another musician, ostensibly to found a college of music. He journeyed by way of Australia, and at Melbourne met the English musician, Mr. Marshall Hall, and heard under his conductorship the first Wagner concert ever given in Melbourne. He had booked his onward passage in the ill-fated Weirarapa, but at the request of the Austrian Consul he delayed his voyage two days. On arriving at Auckland, he found all the flags at half-mast, and learned that the Weirarapa had gone down with all her 300 passengers. In the newspapers he read his own name among the list of the dead. He felt encouraged, and persevered to good purpose. Nelson, his destination, he found a most beautiful place, of 15,000 inhabitants. A Mr. Cock, of Devonshire, who was musical and spoke German, proved a great help. Balling soon discovered that he was expected to play pianoforte duets with the wife of Dr. Johannsen, a Dane, who, finding that he was not a pianist, shelved him entirely. He was stung by this incident into his first attempt to learn the pianoforte, and began his studies with the Prelude to 'Tristan'! After two months' stay he ventured, with little knowledge of English, on a public speech in behalf of his projected School of Music, and raised £300 at his first meeting. The money was spent on instruments, which, some of them unknown in the land, aroused great curiosity when displayed in the shop windows. A New Zealander, Miss Dogtail, taught the pianoforte, and played well; Mr. Balling taught all orchestral instruments and history. In his first harmony class there were twenty-three pupils, including a Colonel Branfield, who had been through the Indian Mutiny and was now over seventy years of age, and a little girl of nine years, daughter of Mrs. Houlker, the teacher of singing. Choral Societies were soon formed, and military brass-band players were quickly converted into wood-wind players for the orchestra. After two years' work the Music School had 200 pupils, and it still continues to be a prosperous institution. Before leaving he conducted Symphonies by Haydn, and the 'Walpurgis Nacht' of Mendelssohn. On visiting the King Country, Balling was much struck with the aboriginal music of the Maoris. In the forests bordering the Wanganui, the Rhine of New Zealand, the melancholy of their chants of mourning reminded him of some of the oldest Catholic hymns. With the corpse placed on a green-laurelled bier in their midst they chanted the story of the deceased, and over it all there was a solo contralto woman's voice, keening in quarter-tones in clear, six-eight time, a tune revolving about the central tone D. Whenever a notable deed was recorded her voice was raised to a point of ecstasy, and always she ended with a falling sigh, like the groan of an animal. Their war-dance, with its strong, rhythmical shouts, 'He, hu, hi, ha,' he found equally striking. At a Court Festival Mr. Balling played viola solos for the Maori King, and was presented with a stick deftly carved by means of fish-shells and stones. In this art of wood carving the Maoris achieve much beautiful work. Mr. Balling thinks this aboriginal race is also really musical, and capable of refined musical culture.

Mr. Balling was brought back to England by Mr. Harold Large to conduct the music to 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' for Mr. Benson's company, on their tour through England, Ireland, and Scotland. In London he gave two recitals on the Ritter viola, and a lecture before the Society of Musicians. For the play, he added to Mendelssohn's music a chorus, 'On the ground, sleep sound,' which was much admired. The tour began with a Festival at Stratford, and Miss Agnes Nicholls here appeared for the first time, singing the part of the Chief Fairy.

A return, as assistant, to Bayreuth came in 1896, when the first performance of the 'Ring' series was given since 1876. Mr. Balling now became on friendly terms with the whole Wagner family. He was next appointed chorus-director of the Hamburg Stadt-theatre, and in eight months he prepared ninety different operas, and conducted all music behind the scenes, attending every rehearsal and every performance. This experience very much widened his knowledge. Here he wrote music also for the 'Christmas plays.' Called upon suddenly to conduct 'The Barber of Seville,' without preparation, he became obsessed with the idea that he might develop into a conductor. Soon afterwards he was appointed conductor at Lübeck, where he gave the first performance of the 'Ring' without cuts.

In this small town he gave thirty-four performances of 'The magic flute' to packed houses. He was next at Breslau, and then became successor to Mottl at Karlsruhe. Here he had his first experience of orchestral concerts, and gave all the Symphonies of Beethoven and Bruckner. At the Lyceum Theatre, Barcelona, he gave twelve performances of 'Die Meistersinger,' the first given there. He next conducted a Beethoven Festival in Rome. Then came an invitation to conduct 'Tristan' at Bayreuth, and his appointment as conductor of the 'Ring,' in succession to Richter. Afterwards illness compelled a year's rest, and he was next heard of as conductor of Mr. Denhof's operatic Festivals in Scotland and the North of England. His popularity on his appearance at Manchester in this connection virtually assured him succession to Richter, as conductor of the Hallé Orchestra. How much Manchester expects of him may be guessed by the present support accorded him.

S. LANGFORD.

JOSEPH MARX'S NEW SONGS.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

In the Musical Times for March, 1912, I reviewed the songs of a remarkable new writer, Joseph Marx. These were published in two collections, the first containing twenty-eight songs, almost all of them of unusually distinguished quality, and a second set of nine, the general level of which was not so high, though one or two of the songs had the same fine flavour as those of the first set. The presumption was that the songs of the second set were compositions which the composer had at first withheld from publication, and had only issued after the success of the choicer things that comprised the first group. Some further collections of songs from his pen have now been issued. These consist of an amplified second set, containing the songs previously published, together with a number of new ones, a third set, and two small volumes of an 'Italienisches Liederbuch.' As Joseph Marx adopts the excellent practice of dating every song he writes, these four groups enable us to form a fairly clear idea of the course of his development.

In my previous article I pointed out that Marx's curious eloquence largely comes from the quality of his harmonic writing. His idiom is perhaps primarily Chopinesque, but in its onward course it seems to have assimilated almost everything that is good in the styles of Wagner, Wolf, and other moderns. It is impossible, of course, to trace an undeviating line of development through all the songs; no man develops with such absolute consistency as that. Speaking broadly, the best of Marx does not emerge until about 1909. Yet so fine a song as the 'Wie einst' is dated 1903,—though it is not impossible that it has been touched up to some extent since that date. At first he seems to have written a good deal for the orchestra; one suspected even that certain songs of the first published set were originally planned for an orchestral accompaniment. In a footnote to one or two of the songs of the second set the composer admits that the accompaniments were originally orchestral; though the confession seems superfluous in view of the extraordinary difficulty—indeed, impossibility—of the accompaniments on the pianoforte. This orchestral habit of thinking, though it has given range and richness to the composer's harmonic style, has not been without certain drawbacks. His harmonic speech was inclined from the first to a certain over-lusciousness; and the great range of colour and of line permitted by the orchestra did nothing to correct this tendency. He was tempted, indeed, both to over-design and over-paint his subject now and then. Writing more exclusively for the pianoforte has served to correct this bias towards excess of utterance. He has apparently now realised the force of Goethe's axiom that it is in his economy that the master reveals himself; it is really much more difficult to characterise a thing accurately with one adjective than with five or six. At the same time his orchestral way of thinking has endowed his pianoforte style with a fine polyphonic quality. With experience, too, his harmonic texture has become at once richer and simpler. A good many of the new songs in the second set are obviously the work of a young man who is only feeling his way. The 'Tuch der Tränen,' for example, is a perfectly horrible piece of harmonic experimentation; both in crudity and ineffectiveness it stands alone among Marx's work. In the best songs of the first set he is seen to have a very copious harmonic vocabulary, a very delicate poetic feeling, and a fully developed technique. His music resembles that of César Franck in the beautiful silkiness of its texture; even in its most poignant moments there is never an angular outline or a harsh note.

From his first set of songs one derived the idea that with all his art of poetic expression he had not the wide psychological range that makes Hugo Wolf's work so remarkable. This impression will probably have to be corrected in view of his later lyrics. It may still be true that there are certain poems with which he has some temperamental difficulty in dealing; though it is hard to say how far his failure in one or two cases may have been due to the lack of the right sort of imagination or to a certain immaturity of conception and technique at the time he wrote these songs. I have already pointed out that his imagination does not readily catch fire from a poem in which a certain sort of realism is almost inevitable. It is probably impossible, for example, to set Paul Verlaine's 'Il pleure dans mon cœur' adequately without some more or less veiled suggestion in the accompaniment of the falling of the rain. This semi-realistic sort of song, in which Schubert, Schumann, Wolf, Strauss and others have worked such wonders, is the kind in which Marx shines least. Other failures of his are no doubt to be attributed less to a fundamental lack of sympathy with the poem than to the fact of his having taken it up at a time when his technique was not sufficiently developed. Such a song, for instance, as 'Ein Fichtenbaum steht einsam' (1908) must be reckoned as one of Marx's comparative failures; yet it is practically certain that he could make a better setting of Heine's poem to-day. In his later songs he undeniably acquires new psychological territory. As I have said, we may take 1909 as the great dividing line in his development. Previously to this there is a good deal that can be only put down as experimental; during and after 1909 his mastery is assured. At the end of the expanded second set we have a remarkably fine song, 'Nachtgebet,' in which the fully developed Marx is quite evident. The harmonic writing here is as rich as, or richer than, that of the most complicated orchestral tissues of Marx's first youth, yet far more concise and consequently far more expressive. The problem before him in his latter years has plainly been the dual one of extending his poetic range while concentrating his musical style.

The third set of songs and the 'Italienisches Liederbuch' show how much he has accomplished in these two directions. From the first set one would have said that he was one of those musicians who, however intense their expression, remain visibly themselves in everything they write. To this order belonged men like Chopin, Grieg, and Schubert. In contrast with them are the musicians who seem instinctively to adopt a new style with each new subject they set to music. Wagner, Wolf, and Strauss are the three striking examples of this order of imagination. In the admirable third set we can see Marx's style beginning to take on a new form and colour in accordance with the atmosphere or the milieu of each song. It would probably have been impossible, for example, for him to have written three or four years ago such a song as the 'Piemontesische Volkslied.' Latterly he seems to have been studying Hugo Wolf. Not that there is any direct imitation of his predecessor; but it is impossible to believe that a song like 'Sankta Maria' would have been written in precisely this form had Wolf not lived.

In the 'Italienisches Liederbuch' Marx's style undergoes a new extension; it takes in a wider mental range, and it achieves its result by simpler means. These poems of Paul Heyse seem, in fact, to have worked some such clarification in Marx's style as they did in that of Wolf. It would be a matter for surprise that these lyrics have been set with such comparative infrequency by previous song-writers, did we not recognise that until Wolf came the idiom of the modern song was hardly sufficiently developed to cope with them. They must be set to music as swift and concentrated as themselves, and with a like agility in change of expression. Not the least remarkable feature of the poems is their sudden modification of atmosphere at the finish; a lyric that apparently begins in a mood of passion will suddenly end upon an unexpected note of irony or menace; and it demands a good deal of concentration of musical style if these changes are to be expressed without an inartistic abruptness of transition. Wolf, with his fine faculty for unifying everything he did, solved these problems with consummate art. Marx's handling of them is hardly less successful. It may be true that without Wolf as a forerunner such a song as 'Die Begegnung' or 'Am Fenster' would never have been written at all, or would have been written in a very different manner; but all the same there is no direct imitation of Wolf, but only a dexterous utilisation of the new technique that he brought into the Lied. These songs are as thoroughly Marxian as any of those of his earlier days. For the rest, it is gratifying to note how aptly he now varies his musical idiom with the particular poem he is setting. This is perhaps the most interesting feature of the 'Italienisches Liederbuch,' though many of the songs themselves rank among the best work he has done. There is an unusual lightness of touch in such songs as 'Die Begegnung,' 'Wie reizend bist du,' 'Nimm dir ein schönes Weib,' 'Venetianisches Wiegenlied,' 'Ständchen' (a particularly charming song), 'Der Dichter,' 'Die Liebste spricht,' 'Abends,' and 'Wofür.' In 'Sendung' we have his quietly expressive style tuned down to a new and very effective simplicity; and in 'Die tote Braut' and 'Die Verlassene' he achieves a very poignant note of tragedy with a concision and directness that would have been impossible to him a few years ago. We shall now look forward with greater interest than ever to his next volume of songs.

WHAT 'JOHN CHRISTOPHER' DID NOT SAY.

BY A PARISIAN.

M. Romain Rolland's book, 'John Christopher in Paris,' recently translated into English, has supplied the British public with a circumstantial—and rather pessimistic—description of musical life in the French capital; or, it would be more accurate to say, with a caustic censure of its shortcomings.

John Christopher's impressions, as set forth by M. Romain Rolland (who, it should be added, has given in his very commendable book, 'Musiciens d'aujourd'hui,' an optimistic counterpart to the passages under notice), cover the defects of the current répertoire of the Paris concerts, the critics' incapacity of dealing with music in a truly critical and at the same time artistic spirit, and the narrowness both of the modern French composers' ideals and of the musical coteries.

Under the first heading, for instance, come the lines: 'Music, German, Russian, Scandinavian, French—everything gulped down without winking. Practically nothing earlier than Beethoven, practically nothing later than Wagner. And what gaps between them! None of the old French masters, none of the great Italians. None of the German giants of the 17th and 18th centuries. No contemporary German music, with the single exception of Richard Strauss, who was more acute than the rest, and came once a year to plant his new works on the Parisian public'

We shall quote no more, as our present object is not to submit M. Romain Rolland's or John Christopher's views to discussion. And if we have quoted at all, it was with the intention of pointing to the fact that this description was written a number of years ago (our copy of the original French edition of 'La Foire sur la Place' bears no date, but we should say eight or ten years), and does not quite suit the present state of things. France, in musical matters, has progressed very rapidly and is still progressing. M. Romain Rolland's cry of warning, however, may have been quite to the point in its time.

But an additional chapter to John Christopher's experiences on the subject of musical life in Paris has remained unwritten. And our intention is to give a synopsis of what that chapter might have been—and, we are sorry to add, still might be. It should concern the attitude of the Paris Press towards musical matters, and would include topics not superfluous for the guidance of foreign artists in Paris.

For wealth of musical information and criticism, the French daily papers cannot compare with those of Great Britain and of other countries. The French public, in fact, does not seem to expect the dailies to keep it posted on forthcoming or on recent musical events; or if it does, the editors to a man disregard that very legitimate expectation. The duty is left entirely to the musical periodicals. And until the foundation, a couple of years ago, of a weekly Guide du Concert, no complete list of forthcoming concerts, with their programmes, was available to the Parisian music-lover.

In most of the daily papers, little space is devoted to musical matters. And the editors do not appear to be very exacting as to the way in which their musical critics do their work. A critic is positively expected to write accounts of first performances, and occasionally of débuts, at the Grand-Opéra, at the Opéra-Comique, and at the Gaité-Lyrique, and of the weekly orchestral Concerts-Colonne, Concerts-Lamoureux, and Concerts du Conservatoire. The remainder is left entirely to his option: and it is no uncommon event that important works, and even novelties, are performed in Paris without the briefest mention of the fact appearing in a majority (and sometimes the totality) of the leading dailies. We hold from good authorities, for instance, that when M. Claude Debussy's Quartette was performed in Paris for the first time, not a single paper noticed the production. And we have been given or have witnessed a number of similar instances.

Of course, many critics take a serious view of their duties, and prove as active as they are conscientious. Some, however, choose to do no more than the necessary minimum. Naturally, the practice leads to a very detrimental state of things, and a state of things from which concert-givers suffer even more than contemporary composers.

It is a sad experience for musicians to give concerts in Paris, and then to find out that little, if any, critical notice is taken of their exertions and possible merits by the representatives of the all-powerful daily Press. But, especially if these artists' programmes comprise only classical works or works that do not particularly rouse the critics' curiosity, such fate is almost inevitably in store for them. A writer signing 'Khluyt' in the Paris Courrier Musical has recently adduced the fact that an artist, after giving in Paris four important concerts, was rewarded by getting in the whole of the daily Press 'two notices, the joint sum of which amounted to thirty-one words.' That this was not an exceptional instance is proved by the following paragraph from an excellent article by Mlle. Marie Daubresse in Le Monde Musical: 'After his concert, if the artist wishes for notices in the big Paris dailies, he will again have to pay. It is true that for cash he can cause it to be printed, even if he played before a half-empty hall, that a disappointed crowd stormed the doors; and even if he elicited but the scantiest applause, that the audience "cheered itself hoarse."' "

Mlle. Daubresse touches here—and with unhesitating hand—the worst evil, an evil not particular, in the French Press, to the musical column: there is no line drawn between the editorial part of most French papers and the advertising sections. Recently the monthly Renaissance Contemporaine held an inquest on the subject of 'Contemporary criticism, its ways and values,' and in a footnote to the answer given by a well-known journalist, the editor of this periodical stated that it would be vain to aver that the confusion did not exist.

It would be superfluous to dwell upon the consequences of such a practice, against which many French journalists are the first to protest.* It weakens the authority of the Press, and does as much harm to fair journalists as to artists who fairly abide by the critics' opinion. Of course the 'communiqués,' or paid insertions, wherever they creep in, hardly deceive professionals nor even experienced French readers. But, especially when reprinted abroad in lists of 'extracts from Press notices,' they probably do mischief enough. Even in France they still influence a part of the general public; and no later than last month the managers of a well-known Paris theatre did not invite the critics to the first performance of a work, but contented themselves with flooding the Press with home-made encomiums.

In a word, the authority to be looked for in ninety-five per cent. of Press notices from Paris is not that of the paper by which the notice was published, but that of the critic by whom it is signed. Failing that, it is almost impossible for many readers, and altogether impossible for readers of 'extracts,' to know whether they are dealing with straightforward criticism, or merely being told that Mr. X——'s music, or Miss Z——'s singing, is worth so many guineas a bar.

In concluding our article we wish to say that . . . no levelled malice

Infects one comma of the course we hold, and that in dealing with our subject unreservedly, but without the slightest exaggeration, we hope not only to be of service to artists, but also to meet with the sympathy of the many French journalists and critics who deplore the present state of things, and earnestly strive to improve it. Paris has become one of the most important musical centres of the world, a centre that gives birth to many good musicians, composers, and critics, and gives fair consecration to more. The many irreproachable members of its musical community can but wish for the disappearance of such blemishes as exist up to the present day, but might easily be removed.

NATIONAL OPERA AND ITS PROSPECTS.

By G. H. CLUTSAM.

With varied schemes for the operatic regeneration of England in the air and various possibilities lurking, mirage-like, on the dim, distant horizon, some preliminary discourse on a fascinating, if chimeric, subject may not be inopportune. Regeneration is a word that perhaps comes overlightly to utterance. It is certainly inapt when applied to the proposition of opera in England.

* M. Arnaud de Masquard, a well-known French expert on advertising matters, is now holding a course (at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales) in which he insists upon the necessity of doing away with this malpractice.

'National opera' is a strong and sturdy war-cry, and undoubtedly, in the cause of patriotism, much money may be forthcoming to further the idea if its promoters have anything tangible to propose. But they obviously have no security to offer the wealthy prospective patrons of their schemes—not even a tradition! Twenty or thirty years ago, before the advent of the new musical thought, and before Wagner had perpetrated his exclusive ideas on an unsuspecting musical world, dividing it against itself, the idea of National opera, intelligently understood, might have been hopeful, significant, and big with promise. Let us have, now, our opera-house, or houses, if you will, our artists trained to a thorough understanding of their business, and our orchestras—well, we already have our orchestras—then What operas are you going to produce?

Opera, from the creative aspect, is but the shadow of its former glorious (for want of a word) self. In the old days, as an art-form it eluded easily and gracefully the average attempt to render it intelligent and attractive from all points of view. Opera is of course, or should be, a combination of appeals—to the ear, the eye, and the sense of drama. Audiences had their doubts about the effect of this combination. The fusion was seldom, if ever, comprehensible to the ordinary intelligence, and judging by most of the 'books' that were set by, for their various periods, quite competent musicians, the attitude of audiences requires no explanation. What could not be denied, however, was the potent charm of the human voice, and opera became successful when it pandered lavishly to the singer, who persisted and pressed in his or her demands for glorification until every particle of sense and intelligibility was coerced out of it.

When Wagner stepped into the arena, recognising the artistic futility of a form barnacled with conventions, many of which he himself never entirely discarded, the time was certainly ripe for a thorough spring-cleaning. He was, of course, not an 'ineffectual angel, beating in the void his luminous wings in vain.' He beat them to some purpose, as we all know; but his art was so encumbered with characteristics specifically and gigantically personal, that its teachings have not only been valueless, taking music and drama as an entity, but have actually hindered any sort of progress. One might as well reckon with Shakespeare as an item in the development of stage literature. The over-appreciation of Wagner's formulæ has killed off many an otherwise promising operatic composer, and at the present moment, outside of Strauss, who treats opera most originally and most perversely as a symphonic-poem with illustrative stage effects, Germany is unable to point with any pride to a single composer of opera who possesses a spark of distinction, let alone genius. D'Albert, Brüll, Kretschmer, Schillings, Pfitzner, Kienzl, Humperdinck, and many others have followed traditional paths with more, or particularly less, success. But actually the futility of finding interest in their output has driven the average German to refuge and relaxation from the strenuous modern commercial every-day life in the all-potent operetta.

Curiously enough, also, the erstwhile patriotic German who still maintains an affection for opera proper is showing a great enthusiasm—even a devotion—to the operas of Verdi and Puccini, not to mention Mascagni and Leoncavallo, who, whatever superior musicians may think of their individual merits, have gripped the popular opera-going taste of the entire world in emphatic fashion. The attraction of 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and 'Pagliacci' is of course anything but entirely a musical one. It is mainly the insidious and trenchant power of enthralling and human drama, as the ordinary mind perceives and enjoys it, attached to music that does not impede its action. The German evidently no longer desires to be educated when he seeks interest or amusement. In this respect he is like every other opera-goer who pays for his seat. Opera is theatre. He is driven to the Italian idea of opera with its chance to the singer and actor. The situation is a natural reaction from the mental disturbance created by the theories of Wagner.

The modern French composer is doing really wonderful things to put another aspect on the purport of opera, principally concerned with atmospheric effect and the creation of a 'Stimmung.' But his appeal is to a daintily-cultured, fastidious audience that will never be sufficiently strong to support financially his ideals. The French public still prefers Massenet (the stagiest of all opera writers), Verdi, and Puccini to Debussy, Dukas, de Bréville, or any other of the new lights. Recognising these facts and coming back to our own prospective National opera, we are faced immediately with a Covent Garden monopoly of practically all the operas that seriously attract the public, and as Covent Garden has hitherto proved impervious to resistance as far as its own productions are concerned, any deliberate opposition appears destined to failure.

Preliminarily we must get the idea of educating the British public into a taste for opera entirely out of our heads. The taste exists. Any graduate scheme of education (the proposal for an historical procession, opera from incubation to maturity, may be recollected) will be immediately resented as an affront to the average intelligence. Nor will a public involve itself in any half-a-crown-in-the-slot contributory project as a nostrum for its own indifference. It will willingly, however, put a half-a-crown in the pit if it is to be edified, interested, or amused. To put the matter frankly, and with all due respect to those English musicians who have appended their worthy signatures to a long and elaborate examination of the possibilities of a National opera—State-aided, if you will—the stratagems for invoking the support of the public are based on an entirely wrong and obstinate appreciation of the situation.

As I have suggested, opera, from the creative aspect, nearly all over the world, is in a state of stagnation. England is a notable exception. It has no opera. And those composers, happily limited in number, who have tentatively ventured into the field find no stage open to them unless they would be content with production, if they could get it, by one or other of the few travelling companies that enlighten the provinces with performances of sorts. Most of them would not. It is impossible to say, of course, how many operas are hidden away in the private cupboards of our composers at the present moment, but it would be safe to assert that the very large majority, unless they happen to be very recent and well-considered productions, will be better esteemed if they are permitted to remain where good fortune has placed them.

The Englishman is in the happiest of operatic conditions. If he has been observant and thoughtful, the evident failure of all other countries to produce a really successful modern opera that proves attractive to a large general public should arouse in him a spirit of ambition. This would actually mean re-creation. Untrammelled by any sort of tradition in his own, and studiously avoiding that of other lands, he is in a position to place a delightful form of entertainment on a footing that might induce the foreigner to substantially replenish his melancholy and matter-of-fact répertoire with works from the pen of the long-despised Englishman. This 'consummation devoutly to be wished' can only be achieved if the strongly-marked musical proclivities of such operatic composers as Verdi, Wagner, Strauss, and Debussy be entirely relegated to oblivion; not by utter repudiation—that of course is impossible—but by a process of assimilation of their most effective operatic qualities; and they are many. He must not listen to the counsellors who tell him some of these masters are erotic, or neurotic, or musically immoral, or are guilty of any vicious tendencies whatever. What they have added technically to their art is for perpetuity.

Then, having forgotten what other people's operas are like, the young—he must be young—English composer must also forget that music itself is not the essential of opera. His music will be listened to by a large general public only when it is heard in association with a first-class book, is adequately mounted, and excellently interpreted. The star-vocalist will need no consideration. The first-class opera librettist who is to satisfy modern needs will avoid the star-vocalist as the first-class dramatist avoids the actor-manager. His text will be to the point—terse, pregnant lines, poetical if possible, but discreetly selected in the matter of the actual words used, and action will be supreme. Closely-knit, vivid moments on the stage, each brief scene full of opportune significance, the story almost capable of being entirely understood by pantomime alone, and when the text is all important a consideration and reticence on the part of the composer that will permit of every word being understood, are essentials that cannot be neglected if English opera is to gain any sort of attention.

All this means that before we start worrying about the foundation of a National opera, we must find our opera librettists. They must come fresh to their work even as the composers come. When the public can be interested in the drama, capably acted, for itself alone, then only can the music, its singers, and the orchestra, step in and give an enhanced value to the work with any chance of success. The technic of the stage (and it holds many valuable effective conventions that need never be despised) requires deliberate study by the composer. Verdi and Puccini owe much of their success to their books. Verdi, particularly in his later works, recognised that many of the old operatic conventions were presuming too much on the intelligence of his audiences, and eliminated them from his stock-in-trade. Many more are still presuming, and that is our composer's affair. He must inform his librettist.

The hardest task to genius or even talent, living contemplatively and contentedly with its ideals, is to sacrifice them to the demands of a general public. It may be bad for art, but it is an absolute necessity when National opera is under consideration, for on the general public its establishment depends. But it is also very fortunate that music can be of the very highest and original quality in association with the drama and still be deliberately and clearly illustrative, and significant of and subservient to the action. These considerations form the only modification of his ideals that requires anything approaching self-obliteration by the composer. When half-a-dozen or so of these fine, entirely modern operas—text and music—are completed, then everybody can be up and doing. Our National opera will have a proper foundation.

In the meantime, schools of all sorts can be giving their students stage experience. Many old things can be revived and will be of some assistance, but they must not be inflicted on the public, who will not listen to scales and exercises. When the time is ripe, our interpreters will have probably to forget all they have learned, but that will not matter. The only danger ahead is that when the new operas are ready, with the singers and theatre and finances—everything perhaps State-aided—the authorities at the head of affairs might feel on surer ground with something they knew, and produce Mozart's 'La clemenza di Tito.'

At the dinner of the Livery Club of the Musicians' Company, held on November 22, Mr. Ian Malcolm, M.P., made an interesting and witty speech, in the course of which he told the following story:

It was very late one evening when an old man was under the impression that he was playing a Bach fugue on a three-manual organ, whereas, in reality, he was seated upon the pavement tenderly fingering the doorsteps leading up to a house in Grosvenor Square. 'Pass on,' said the policeman, 'we can't have any loitering here.' 'I cannot pass on yet,' said the old man, 'till I have finished this Bach Fugue.' 'Bach be blowed,' said the policeman; 'I never heard of him. Come along with me.' 'I cannot come with you,' replied the musician, sadly; 'I cannot be seen walking in the street with a man who does not know Bach.'

Occasional Notes.

On another page we print a correspondence that appeared recently in The Times in which some delicate ethical questions regarding the relations of composers and publishers are discussed. It was first pointed out that the royalty system of payment was on the whole the best for a composer, and as to this there was no dispute, inasmuch as the system has been widely accepted for many years. Then it was further stated, with somewhat aggressive assurance, that the late Coleridge-Taylor was refused a royalty on his most popular work, 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' and on the other two parts of 'Hiawatha' subsequently published. In answer to this, Messrs. Novello assert with indisputable authority that the question of a royalty on these works was not discussed and was therefore not refused. These matters being disposed of, a new, unprecedented and imperative demand was made that the publishers of 'Hiawatha' should investigate and disclose publicly the profits made on the successful works and state how those profits had been applied. No curiosity as to the amount of losses incurred over other works of the composer or upon works by other English composers, losses which inevitably must be recouped from funds created by profits! No demand that the several other publishers of the late composer's works shall render an account of the profit made on successful works purchased outright, and publicly state their intentions as to its application! Was it just to assume that Messrs. Novello & Co., with the record of a hundred years' fair and honourable dealing, which has placed them in the front rank of music publishers of the world—a position publicly recognised at a banquet organized in their honour last December—should need a spur from outsiders in order to rouse in them a sense of their obligations?

Would it be fair to assume, simply because they have made no public parade of their doings and intentions, that the three writers of these letters—all honourable men—have done nothing and do not intend to make any sacrifices in order to assist the family? And on this assumption should we be entitled to write to The Times and rebuke these honourable gentlemen, and with a superior air instruct them as to what they ought to do to save their reputations? Yet this is precisely what has been done with reference to Messrs. Novello. On the part of their critics there is no evidence of a desire to discover all the truth of a difficult and delicate situation that had arisen before the first of the letters appeared in The Times, and as to which even now we are obliged to be loyally silent. Preposterous fairy-tales of high profits are assiduously circulated—tales which a cursory intelligent consideration would dissipate. Equally ill-informed and incorrect statements are allowed currency as to the condition and prospects of the late composer's family. Only the sentimental aspects of a portion of the whole case are dwelt upon. Surely such indiscreet tactics are calculated to defeat the cause they are supposed to serve, and that cause has good reason to desire to be saved from its friends. Dr. Sprigge and the other writers allude to an appeal that has been made. What appeal is referred to? In assisting to promote the recent concert given at the Royal Albert Hall we were expressly desired, by those most nearly concerned, not to announce the event as an 'appeal,' but as a tribute to the memory of the late composer. In common with many persons we regret keenly that a very sad occasion, which was uniting so many forces in a common bond of sympathy, has been associated with a quite unnecessary and barren controversy.

One of the most interesting announcements of the past month was that Dr. Henry Coward and a select choir of forty-five voices were to appear on the boards at the Coliseum for a series of half-hour performances, to open on December 30. Such a scheme would be popular at a Northern place of entertainment, where the choral tradition is deep-seated amongst the people, but to establish it in London is a bold stroke of policy. The Coliseum stage, however, has seen the production of Sir Edward Elgar's masque 'The Crown of India,' and at the Hippodrome, where the level of taste is similar to that of the Coliseum, a Dutch choir recently made a 'hit' with unaccompanied choral singing. Dr. Coward's enterprise is gratifying as a further stage in the emancipation of our better-class music-hall entertainments, and of course those who need no instruction in these matters always welcome Yorkshire choristers. The repertory, which is extensive, includes Boughton's 'King Arthur,' Bantock's 'On Himalay,' Elgar's 'The Dance,' 'The marksman,' and 'Go, song of mine,' thirteen other mixed-voice pieces, four for ladies' voices, and three for male voices.

An excellent impression appears to have been made in Berlin by the Beecham Orchestra. In a message to The Times, dated December 17, a correspondent says:

Mr. Thomas Beecham's orchestra, which has already made something of a reputation here by its playing at the performances at the Kroll Theatre of the Russian Ballet, gave the first of two concerts last night at the Royal High School for Music. The concert was a great success, and the audience gave a particularly warm reception to some works of Vaughan Williams, Balfour Gardiner, and Frederick Delius. The orchestra, indeed, played extremely well, and there were numerous soli passages of a formidable character for the different orchestral groups which thoroughly tested the capabilities of the wood and brass players.

A correspondent of the Daily Telegraph translates opinions expressed in the German Press. He writes:

In the 'Musical Metropolis of Europe,' as it was called by Heine, it is one thing to capture the favour of a concert audience and quite another, and much more difficult one, to extort praise from critics. Mr. Thomas Beecham and his orchestra have managed to do both. In the Berliner Tageblatt Dr. Leopold Schmidt writes:

'The English orchestra displays exemplary training, and finished off its renderings with the utmost care. Mr. Beecham is, as a conductor, a personality of temperament, who, with or without the baton, makes use of a somewhat exaggerated language of gesture, but does not err in feeling.'

To the Lokalanzeiger the English conductor is 'absolutely without doubt not only a sound musician but a born master of orchestra.' The Börsen Courier says: 'The true domain of the capable Mr. Beecham lies in the theatrical opera, and it is here that we should like to meet again the temperament of this mobile artist.' For the orchestra this paper has the high eulogy that 'these musicians, and especially the violins, play with a sovereign sureness, and it must be pleasure to be their leader and conductor.'

The Deutsche Tageszeitung says that Mr. Beecham 'proved himself to be a versatile and spirited conductor, who directs his instrumentalists with eloquent gesture and expressive indications of phrasing.'

In the Morgenpost he is described as 'an orchestra leader of distinction, and a conductor whose handling of the baton testifies to mastery at once vigorous and mild over the body of tone which is subject to him.' The same critic speaks of the instrumentalists having 'achieved distinction by the beauty of their tone, their precision, and the rhythmical and spiritual animation of their renderings.'

THE DALCROZE SYSTEM OF RHYTHMIC GYMNASTICS.

The visit of M. Jaques-Dalcroze to this country in November last, which was undertaken for the purpose of demonstrating the system of developing the sense of rhythm which is associated with his name, occasioned widespread interest. The demonstrations were given at Caxton Hall, Westminster (November 15); Ladies' College, Cheltenham (November 16); Leeds, Albert Hall (November 18), and at the Town Hall (November 19); the Victoria University, Manchester (November 20); the Goldsmiths' College, New Cross, London (November 23); Hall of the London University, South Kensington (November 25); and the Queen's Theatre, London (November 26).

The audiences were always very large, and deeply interested. M. Dalcroze brought with him six school children from Geneva. It was stated that these children had not had full instruction in the method, but merely two lessons a week of fifty minutes each, while continuing their ordinary school work. Two of the children were under twelve, two under fourteen, one was fifteen, and one over sixteen years of age. They had learned the system two, three, four and five years respectively. As the demonstrations, although varied as to detail, were generally alike, it will suffice to describe that which was given at the Caxton Hall. Here, as on other occasions, M. Dalcroze gave a preliminary address in French, in which he drew attention to the underlying psycho-physiological principle upon which his method is based. He remarked that for the last twenty years scientists have noticed the influence which rhythmic movements of the body have upon the intellectual development of mentally deficient children. The muscular sensations enrich the brain with motor images, the harmonization of muscular antagonisms produces a mental calmness favourable to thought and forms direct co-ordinations between brain and body. But if this re-education of the motor-nerve centres has a good influence upon the intellectual development of the mentally deficient, why should it not have the same happy effect in the case of the normal?

At the Caxton Hall, as elsewhere, the audiences were as far as possible arranged in a great circle surrounding a large level floor space. The demonstrators, all girls, were clad in a light, loose-fitting garment that reached to their knees and left arms and legs bare, and they wore nothing on their feet. Their movements, therefore, were wholly unimpeded. It is impossible to describe in words the numerous exercises the girls went through during the two hours whilst they were before the audience. One of the most striking features was the ease with which they performed rhythmic movements of the most extraordinary complexity; and the entire absence of self-consciousness displayed by the children—even up to the point of the last demonstration of the series, added greatly to the fascination of the proceedings.

We quote the following description from the School Music Review (December number):—

At first quite elementary exercises in beating with the hand, and walking and running time were done. M. Dalcroze extemporised on the pianoforte, and as he is an accomplished musician real musical interest was imparted, and the girls with amazing rapidity adapted their movements to the varying measures and tempi of his playing. It was not merely that the rhythm was shown by movement, but everything done was so spontaneous and graceful. Then followed far more remarkable exercises, that were performed with such ease that probably many of the audience failed to realise their significance and normal difficulty. Thus syncopation was shown with perfect accent and freedom, and one arm would beat three against four of the other arm, and one arm would follow the other in 'canon,' both beating four. But the climax of this power of differentiating muscles and of mental realisation of contradictory accent was the pulsation of the head in twos, one arm in threes, the other arm in fours, with the feet marching in fives all simultaneously. In this case the rate of all the pulses was the same. Then the two arms freely and quite accurately beat three against four and three against two—that is each group occupying the same period of time. There were other exercises in compounding rhythm. M. Dalcroze improvised music in which the right and left hands played totally different measures (say one in four-, and the other in three-time). The rhythms thus invented were maintained in the playing, and presently the children picked out one rhythm with the hands and the other with the feet. Another interesting example of accurate observation and perfect control was running in canon. A rhythmic theme was played on the pianoforte, and after one bar the children stepped the foregoing bar and continued this idea, having thus to realise the rhythm of the bar being played whilst they were executing the previous bar. Crescendo and Diminuendo were illustrated by apt movements; a pair of 'horses'—now high stepping, now pawing—with the driver doing another 'step,' was a further and fascinating performance of contrasted rhythmic pulsation. What became obvious as the work proceeded was that M. Dalcroze did not merely play on the pianoforte—he played upon the children. An attractive and cleverly-devised performance was that associated with the playing of Bach's C minor Fugue (No. 2 of the '48'). Three pairs of children each took a 'voice' of the Fugue, and ingeniously acted its rhythms. The final uniting cadence was almost touching in its expressiveness of bodily grace. Then each child in turn took a baton and conducted the other children through a known song, using all the wiles of Rubato, Rallentando, &c., and mimicking—no doubt quite unconsciously—the airs of the conventional grown-up conductor.

The following observations on the potentialities of the system in its application to general musical culture are also quoted from the School Music Review:

It is not easy at once to estimate the value of the extraordinary plasticity of mind and muscular adjustment exhibited, or to see how it can be applied generally. The somewhat natural impression of a listener for the first time, is, that while all that is shown is admirable and surprising, the results are of the hot-house order, and not likely to be cultivatable in the common garden of the school. Again, it is easy to be so obsessed with the glamour, the fascination of what is presented, that one takes it in as a charming entertainment. We do not watch Maud Allan or Gœtte in order to learn how to reproduce their salutory evolutions and poses in the school. Even to more thoughtful observers on the look-out for something they can add to their equipment as teachers, there is apt to be a feeling that the ideas expounded, splendidly as they are illustrated, cannot be adapted to fit average circumstances. This attitude assumes that attempts at progress must necessarily fit existing conditions. But there is the other view—that it is more rational, if the new ideas are proved to be good, that the conditions should be moulded to receive them. For our own part, we see visions of things in the Dalcroze system, as well as in other similar appeals founded upon rhythmic mental and bodily development, that will soon be more closely associated with the word 'education' than they are at present, and be recognized as one of its supremely important objectives. M. Dalcroze may not yet have taught us what he can do with millions of children, but his demonstrations have indicated a path it is impossible to ignore.

Other matters connected with the system are also discussed in the School Music Review. Those who desire to know more of the ideas that have inspired M. Dalcroze should read the admirably-written book, 'The Eurythmics of Jaques-Dalcroze,' published by Constable & Co. (15.).

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

PERFORMANCE OF MACKENZIE'S 'COLOMBA.'

The revival of this opera by the Royal College of Music drew a large and distinguished musical audience to His Majesty's Theatre on the afternoon of December 9. As explained in our last issue, the work was originally produced at Drury Lane Theatre on April 9, 1883, by the Carl Rosa Opera Company, and was performed five times during a short season, with increasing success. The tragic story of the opera is founded upon a tale by Prosper Mérimée, and it deals with a relentless vendetta between two Corsican families. The original libretto was written by Francis Hueffer. In view of this performance, the opportunity was taken for examination and revision, with the result that the former four acts were compressed into three, considerable portions of the libretto were re-written by Mr. Claude Aveling, and some of the music was newly composed.

The cast was as follows:

Count de Nevers	...	Percy Thomas (Student)
(Governor of Corsica)
Orso della Rebbia	...	George Macklin (Scholar)
(An Officer in the French Army)
Brando Savelli (a Brigand)	...	William Green (Scholar)
Giuseppe Barracini	...	Joseph Ireland (ex-Scholar)
(a Lawyer)
Antonio (his Brother)	}	Jacob Williamson (Scholar)
Sergeant of Marines
Colomba (Sister of Orso)		Olive Sturgess (Exhibitioner)
Lydia	...	Idwen Thomas
(the Count's Daughter)		(Exhibitioner)
Chilina	...	Lillie Chipp (Exhibitioner)
(Savelli's Daughter)
A Market Woman	...	Clara Simons (Student)
Peasant Girl (May-Queen)	...	Marjorie Hamilton (Student)
Stage-director—Mr.	Cairns James.
Chorus-master—Mr.	Harold Samuel.
The dances arranged by Mr.	B. Soutten.

The orchestra of fifty-six players consisted of past and present pupils of the College, with the exception of seven members. Sir Charles Stanford conducted.

Of the performance it is possible to speak in terms of great praise, especially in view of the fact that it was undertaken by students. There were many evidences of conscientious preparation, and some of budding dramatic capacity. Mr. George Macklin (Orso) displayed a capital voice and style, although he has yet to acquire a stage presence. Miss Sturgess, in the title-part, showed considerable capacity both as a singer and as an actress. A very noteworthy performance was that of Miss Lillie Chipp (Chilina), who was perhaps more at her ease on the stage, more lively, and pointed, than any of her collaborators. Mr. Ireland (Barracini) was a fairly fearsome villain and Mr. William Green (Brando) showed good qualities; the other chief characters—amongst whom special mention should be made of Miss Idwen Thomas, who sang charmingly—were all acceptable. A May-Queen dance, which approached the dimensions of a set ballet, was a very attractive feature, and served admirably to relieve the tragic note of the plot. This portion of the work was remarkably well stage-managed. Surely this section would bear separate performance in these days when music-halls are catering with 'turns' for the lovers of good music.

As to the music there was consensus of opinion that it provided a constant flow of easily apprehended melody, and the orchestration was always a matter of interest and never overpowered the singers. Colomba's song at the beginning of the second act proved to be one of the most effective and beautiful numbers in the work, and the quartet, 'Let the past be dead' is an excellent example of concerted music effectively written for the voice. A ballad in the third act, 'So he thought of his love and went on his way,' admirably sung by Miss Chipp, is another example of the composer's skill and his gift of melody. One sometimes felt that although the climaxes and more intense situations were dramatic, they were not always dramatic enough, the lyrical element being somewhat too predominant; but even so, the influence of ever-welcome melody and the constant rhythmic vitality kept the attention alert throughout the performance.

When the work was performed in 1883 it was pronounced by some critics to be Wagnerian in its idiom, apparently mainly because of the use of representative themes. But although this idea of cohesion is discernible in 'Colomba,' it is difficult now to see other resemblances to what in these days is understood to be Wagnerism. The music represents no 'school.' The composer before he wrote this opera was subjected to many diverse influences, and he apparently wrote down what came to him naturally. The revival thoroughly justified the great trouble taken by Sir Charles Stanford and the resources he conducted. It was surely a pity that all this preparation should be spent over only one presentation. But if the exigencies of the College work do not permit repetition, at least it will be to the everlasting credit of its students and their professors that they recognised the ability of a British composer who is at the head of an institution, the Royal Academy of Music, which is sometimes erroneously supposed to be a rival to their own. It was gratifying to witness the enthusiastic and obviously sincere reception accorded to Sir Alexander Mackenzie after the end of the performance, not only from the audience but from the whole of the performers who were assembled on the stage. When shall we hear 'Colomba' again?

CITY ORGANIST, LIVERPOOL.

RECOMMENDATION OF THE ADJUDICATORS.

The Finance Committee of the Corporation on December 20 received the report of the adjudicators on the competition held in St. George's Hall on December 19. The adjudicators—Sir Walter Parratt, Sir Charles Stanford, and Sir Frederick Bridge—unanimously found in favour of candidate No. 7, whom they knew only by this number. On reference to the official list this gentleman proved to be Mr. Herbert F. Ellingford, Mus. Bac., F.R.C.O., A.R.C.M., at present organist at St. George's Parish Church, Belfast, and to the Earl of Shaftesbury. The Committee resolved to recommend the City Council at their next meeting, on January 1, to appoint Mr. Ellingford to the vacant post. There were twelve candidates selected out of a total of fifty-seven.

Mr. Ellingford entered the Royal College of Music in 1893. In 1894 he took an organ exhibition, and from 1895 to 1897 he held a full scholarship won at an open competition. He left the College in 1898, after having won the prize for extempore playing on the organ. He holds the A.R.C.M. for organ and piano-forte teaching, and he became F.R.C.O. in 1896. For nine years he was organist to the Bow and Bromley Institute Choir, while it was conducted by Dr. McNaught. From 1891 to 1901 he was organist at St. Andrew's Church, Leytonstone, afterwards going to St. Peter's Parish Church, Carmarthen, where he remained until 1906. After a short period at Dover he became organist at St. George's Church, Belfast, and he has continued in that capacity until the present time. It may be presumed that the Council will adopt the recommendation of the adjudicators and committee.

M. YSAÏE AND THE ELGAR VIOLIN CONCERTO.

An interview with M. Ysaÿe was recorded in Musical America (New York), of November 23, and was reproduced in The Globe (London), on December 7.

As the statements made by M. Ysaÿe were calculated to give very incorrect impressions regarding what had taken place in the negotiation for M. Ysaÿe's playing of the Elgar Violin concerto in this country, Messrs. Novello & Co. sent the following letter to both of the above-named journals. It appeared in The Globe on December 17.

TO THE EDITOR OF The Globe.

SIR,—Our attention has been called to an article in The Globe of the 7th instant, in which you quote from Musical America of November 23rd ult. the report of an interview with M. Eugen Ysaÿe, at which that gentleman is represented to have said :

I do not claim to have brought great quantities of new music of great significance with me. In Europe I have played a new Concerto by Moor, and also the Elgar. I should have liked to play the Elgar here, but I finally abandoned it because of the endless difficulties I had with the publishers and the enormous royalties they were asking. The composer himself is so effectively bound, hand and foot, that he can do nothing to aid the artist. It seems a very foolish thing to me that it should thus become the fashion to hinder the propaganda for a great work. And the Elgar Concerto is a great work—the finest thing in its way, I claim, since the Concerto of Brahms.

Without pretending to know what M. Ysaÿe means by 'endless difficulties,' or his precise definition of 'enormous royalties,' or by what sort of mental process he arrived at the conclusion that 'the composer himself is so effectively bound, hand and foot, that he can do nothing to aid the artist,' we should like, with your permission, to state the following plain facts :

I.—During the summer of 1911, M. Ysaÿe had contracted with the authorities of Queen's Hall, London, to play the Elgar Concerto on three occasions during the following autumn. The terms, as far as they affected Sir Edward Elgar and ourselves, had been agreed upon between the Queen's Hall secretary and ourselves. Similarly M. Ysaÿe had contracted with the committee of the Norwich Festival to play the Concerto at the Norwich Triennial Festival, 1911. In that case also the terms, as far as they affected Sir Edward Elgar and ourselves, had been agreed upon between the secretary of the Festival and ourselves. In neither of these cases, therefore, had we any occasion to discuss terms with M. Ysaÿe.

On September 5, 1911, however, we received a letter from M. Ysaÿe, in which he asked us to send the score and parts to him at his house at Godinne, Belgium, 'gracieusement,' as he wanted to practise the work with his orchestra in Brussels, presumably with a view to the three advertised performances of the work by him at Queen's Hall, London, and the one performance at the Norwich Festival ; and later on the music was sent to him for that purpose. Anticipating, however, that M. Ysaÿe might be contemplating performances of the work on the Continent of Europe, we sent our representative to Godinne with instructions to negotiate with M. Ysaÿe for performances of the work, and to ascertain whether he would be prepared to play the Concerto on the Continent of Europe at a reduced fee for a series of performances.

To this M. Ysaÿe replied 'Quoi ! un homme de mon rang, de ma position et indépendance—me faire une proposition pareille, or words to that effect ; and our representative returned to London, with a message from M. Ysaÿe that under no circumstances would he enter into such a contract. Thereupon we wrote to M. Ysaÿe a letter, dated September 12, in which we stated that the composer of the work must derive some benefit from performances of his work, and we offered to allow M. Ysaÿe to perform the work, and to lend him the music, for £5 for single performances, or £4 for each performance if he would play the work twenty times in one season on the Continent of Europe. At the same time we told him that, with a small deduction for ourselves for the loan of the material, the whole of the fees would be handed over by us to the composer. This proposition he declined, and he wrote us the following letter :

Godinne, 13 Sept., 1911.

MONSIEUR,—Après l'entretien que j'avais eu avec Monsieur Rosenkranz, au cours duquel j'ai expliqué clairement les raisons qui me forçaient à ne pouvoir souscrire au nouveau règlement affecté à l'exécution du Concerto d'Elgar, j'avais cru et espéré non seulement recevoir de suite le matériel dont j'avais besoin pour étudier l'œuvre avec les moyens dont je dispose ici-même, mais aussi qu'il ne serait plus un moment question d'un droit à payer, ni pour moi, ni pour les sociétés philharmoniques auxquelles je proposerais l'œuvre. Je vois par la lettre que vous m'écrivez que je me suis trompé, qu'il y a marchandage, que vous me tenez un langage qui s'éloigne singulièrement de l'idée artistique qui est la seule qui m'ait guidé, moi, pendant le long travail du Concerto.

Je ne discute pas les raisons d'intérêt qui vous font agir ; je me refuse d'entrer dans une discussion pénible à ce sujet, je crois seulement qu'il est peu possible que le Compositeur vous ait invité à m'écrire les misérables considérations dont la lecture fait mal au cœur. Je regrette de devoir vous apprendre que je renonce à exécuter le Concerto d'Elgar ; cette résolution m'est dictée par une raison de dignité où les transactions commerciales n'ont rien à voir.—Recevez Mr. mes salutations,
E. YSAÏE.

There, as far as we were concerned, the matter ended, except that M. Ysaÿe retained the music which we had lent to him for a special purpose, and subsequently played the work in several German towns without our authority, in spite of our protests, and in defiance of our rights. We, and Sir Edward Elgar, wrote repeatedly requesting him to return the music, and ultimately we were compelled to employ the services of a Brussels lawyer before we could recover its possession. In the meantime, M. Ysaÿe cancelled his engagements to play the work at the Queen's Hall and at Norwich, notwithstanding that in both cases the authorities who had engaged his services had, by agreeing to pay our fees, done everything 'to aid the artist,' and in spite of the fact that Sir Edward Elgar had cabled to him offering to waive the fees for the four English performances.

II.—As regards all other performances of this work our usual fee has been seven and a-half guineas, which includes the loan of the music. Only in three or four cases have we received a larger fee, and the fee has never exceeded ten guineas. In fact, with one exception, we have never asked for more. That exception was one which has already been commented upon in the American Press ; and in that case also, the correct facts were not disclosed. We refer to the case when, on January 3, 1911, we were approached by the agent of Miss Maud Powell, who was desirous not only of playing the work at the Norfolk (America) Festival in June, 1911, but also of securing for that occasion the right of first performance in the United States of America. A very special fee was asked for in that case, not in respect of the actual performance at Norfolk, but because, had she secured the right of first performance for that Festival, Miss Powell would have prevented all other performances in the United States during the interval—a period of five months.

III.—Of all fees paid to us for performances of Elgar's Concerto, at least two-thirds are handed over to the composer, and the charges have been made with his entire approval and concurrence, in most cases the fees having been settled in consultation with him. This hardly warrants the assertion, and all that is wrapped up in it, that the composer himself is effectively bound, hand and foot, by his publishers.

All these facts can be proved by evidence now in our possession ; and the fees demanded, whether they are 'enormous' or not, have been obtained 'to aid the artist,' that is, the composer, who in our opinion is as much entitled to consideration as the other artist, who is the best paid violinist in the world. Is M. Ysaÿe unwilling to 'aid the artist' ? Or does he think when he plays the Concerto of Elgar, which he admits is the finest thing in its way 'since the Concerto of Brahms,' that there is only one artist in the field ; and that the publishers, who endeavour to protect the interests of the other man, are placing 'endless difficulties' in the way.

'Je regrette de devoir vous apprendre que je renonce à exécuter le Concerto d'Elgar ; cette résolution m'est dictée par une raison de dignité où les transactions commerciales n'ont rien à voir.' But is M. Ysaye himself wholly indifferent to 'transactions commerciales'?—Yours, &c., London, December 16. (Signed) NOVELLO & Co., Ltd.

The Globe comments as follows :

'TO AID THE ARTIST.'

By the interesting letter of Messrs. Novello we published yesterday the old question of the right of the creative artist to secure a fair royalty on the work of his brain is raised in a form to which, as we hold, there can be but one answer. In the interests of Sir Edward Elgar, whose Violin concerto is recognised by all musicians as a composition of rare power and beauty, the firm of publishers demand a reasonable royalty on its performance. M. Ysaye, a violinist whose reputation and capacity are of the highest, seems to have regarded the modest demands 'to aid the artist' as unconscionable, and such as to merit condemnation at his hands. When we consider how small is the possible money compensation for such an effort of the creative musician as the Violin concerto of Sir E. Elgar, limited as it is by the comparatively few executants of capacity sufficient to give it effective performance, there is something churlish in the attitude of the world-famous executant as revealed in yesterday's correspondence. To contrast the fees of the man who composes with those of the man who plays is to realise one of the world's inequalities.

Church and Organ Music.

The special Advent Service at St. Paul's Cathedral on December 3, when Brahms's 'Requiem' was given, was attended by a crowded congregation. The performance of the great work was in all respects notable, and will live long in the memory of all who were present. The choral and solo portions were sustained entirely by the members of the Cathedral Choir, and there was a full orchestra. Sir George Martin conducted, and Mr. Charles Macpherson played the organ. Sir George Martin's impressive setting of the 'De Profundis' was included in the service. It is indeed satisfactory to know that the deep meaning of Brahms's masterpiece is impressing itself on people in ever-increasing numbers, and that the attendances at St. Paul's at its performance have been steadily improving.

On Sunday afternoon, December 15, a section of the Brixton Oratorio Choir, numbering some fifty voices, gave a fine performance of 'Hear my Prayer' (Mendelssohn) and selected numbers from Brahms's 'Requiem' and the 'Light of Life' (Elgar) at Brixton Prison, on the invitation of the Chaplain, the Rev. J. B. S. Watson. Mr. Douglas Redman conducted, and Mr. Welton Hickin was the organist. A small but effective orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. George Penney, added much to the impressiveness of the performance. Miss Maud Wilby was heard to great advantage as soloist, and the choruses were sung with much feeling and power. In subsequently thanking the choir, the Chaplain laid much stress on the undoubted good that such services exercised upon the auditors.

The chief feature of Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull's organ recital at the Albert Hall, Manchester, on December 4, was the first production in that city of three new pieces by Herr Sigfrid Karg-Elert. These were the 'Pastelle,' a delightful little conception of considerable harmonic interest ; the Chaconne in B flat minor, consisting of thirty-one variations upon a ground bass ; and the choral improvisation on the Titanic hymn-tune, 'Nearer, my God, to Thee,' for which Karg-Elert has selected Sullivan's melody.

The fourth Festival Service of the Leytonstone Church Choir Association, held at the Church of St. Augustine, Leytonstone, on the evening of October 24, included Stanford's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat, Goss's fine anthem, 'Stand up and bless the Lord your God,' and the unaccompanied anthem by Lee Williams, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace.' The choir numbered ninety voices.

The annual Festival Service in connection with the Burnley branch of the Manchester Diocesan Church Music Society was held in the Parish Church, Burnley, on November 14. The anthem after the third Collect was Elgar's 'Light of the world,' and after the offertory hymn Mendelssohn's 'Judge me, O God' was given unaccompanied. The choir of about 250 voices sang with great care and considerable expression. Mr. J. E. Gaul accompanied the service, and Mr. James Armistead gave a short recital before and after the service. Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank conducted.

Choir Festival Services were held at the Halifax Place Chapel, Nottingham, on November 17, when Part 1 of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was given under the conductorship of Mr. E. M. Barber. The soloists were Miss Warner, Madame Parkin, Messrs. J. Franklin Pearson, and Joseph Asher. Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson presided at the organ.

On November 26 there was held in the Cathedral a Festival of parish choirs associated with East Bristol. The choirs which took part were the following : All Hallows, All Saints (Fishponds), St. Agnes, St. Andrew (Montpelier), St. Anne (Greenbank), St. Barnabas, St. John (Fishponds), St. Luke (Barton Hill), St. Matthew (Moorfields), St. Thomas (Eastville), and St. Werburgh. The total numbers present were 245. Mr. Hubert W. Hunt was at the organ during the service, and before the choirs entered the Cathedral Mr. Calway played. Mr. A. W. Parkman was conductor. The music was excellently performed, there being unanimity and animation. Dr. A. H. Brewer's anthem, 'Blessing, glory, wisdom, and thanks,' was well sung by the associated choirs. After the service Mr. Sellick played upon the organ.

An instructive and interesting lecture was delivered by the Rev. Noel A. Bonavia-Hunt, on November 28, before the members of the Incorporated Guild of Church Musicians, entitled 'The Sorrows of a Choirmaster.' Dr. J. M. Bentley was in the chair.

On December 1, Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was sung at St. Barnabas Church, Guildford Road, South Lambeth, under the direction of Mr. W. G. Goodway, who presided at the organ. The soloists were Messrs. H. J. Tozer and W. Uren, and Masters Jack Richards and Arthur Plastow, the quartet parts being given by Messrs. Tozer and Uren, and Masters Arthur Tydeman and Cuthbert Fowler.

A large congregation attended the Church of St. John's, Upper St. Leonard's, on Wednesday afternoon, December 11, when Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was performed by the choir and St. John's Musical Society, assisted by a special orchestra. The principal soloist was Mr. George Brierley, tenor soloist at St. Paul's Cathedral. Mr. T. S. Ginger, organist of Bexhill Parish Church, was as the organ. Great credit is due to Mr. O'Connor, the organist and choirmaster of St. John's, for the able manner in which he discharged his duties as conductor.

At Hornsey Parish Church, on Wednesday, December 11, Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was given with organ and additional accompaniment of trumpets and timpani. This is the twenty-third consecutive Advent performance under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Baker. Mr. Herbert J. Baggs presided at the organ.

'Elijah' was performed at All Saints' Church, Hastings, on December 11, by Dr. Abram's Musical Union. Mr. Henry Poole was the organist.

A performance of 'Elijah' was given at the Battersea Polytechnic by the Choral Society and Orchestra on December 14, under the direction of Dr. H. Davan Wetton, head of the music department. The soloists were Miss Lenta Labach, Miss Frances Niblock, Miss Nellie Walker, Miss Christine Scott, and Messrs. Joseph Boddy, H. A. Baldry, Bevington Rosse, and John Miles. Miss Mabel Tudor-Craig was principal first violin. Miss Alice Baker was at the pianoforte, and Mr. E. E. Douglas-Smith the organist.

HALIFAX MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

Until a few years ago this Society was in what it would now consider a position of obscurity. On entering into the competition movement it immediately made an enormous stride forward, under the guidance of the conductor, Mr. H. Shepley. It has now won the chief prize for mixed-voice choirs at Blackpool twice in succession, and achieved such a position and standard that the concerts given in its native town, apart from its competitive work, are events of considerable importance and interest. In our issue for April, 1912, we gave an account of a special Bantock concert, with portrait of Mr. T. W. Benson, the president, and of Mr. Shepley.

On December 7, the Society gave its first concert of the present season in the Victoria Hall, Halifax, with the following interesting programme:

Madrigal, 'Ye that do live in pleasures plenty'	Wilbye
'Since first I saw your face'	Ford
'Flow, O my tears'	Benet
'Cargoes'	H. Balfour Gardiner
'The two fiddlers'	Chapuis
Scottish Folk-song	arr. by E. L. Bainton
'Airs of summer'	H. Elliot Button
'Nocturne'	Bantock
'My soul would drink those echoes' ...	Mackenzie

With the exception of the first in the list no single interpretation left any loophole for criticism. The choir excels in tone-quality—that of its male-voices in particular,—in mentality of interpretation, and in the technical finesse necessary to give effect to it. Two extreme examples in the programme—Ford's simple part-song and Mackenzie's elaborate eight-part work—illustrated the close union this choir has made between technique and expression. The perfect suppression and smoothness of the one and the closely-woven phrasing, fine grading, and intimate significance of the other arose, and could only arise, from the most thorough choral discipline. The closing page of 'My soul would drink those echoes' was a thing to live in the memory. One of the most interesting features of the occasion was the performance—the first on record, of Balfour Gardiner's striking part-song 'Cargoes.' The mystery of the opening, the distant effect of the Nineveh verse, and the apt contrasts in all that followed were a testimony to the composer's imagination and to the choir's ready perception. Mr. Button's pretty and delicate part-song was sung to perfection. Bantock's romantic 'Nocturne' was given with perfect chording and subtle mood. Every choral interpretation, including that of Bruch's 'Morning song of praise,' given as an encore, was out of the ordinary. The concert was a tribute to the artistic perception of Mr. Shepley and the enthusiasm of his ninety chorists. Assistance was given by Madame Shergold and Mr. Herbert Brown (vocalists), Miss Kirkman (violinist), and Miss A. Taylor (accompanist).

THE NEW ORGAN FOR LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL.

THE LARGEST IN THE WORLD.

We are glad to place before our readers the first publication of the full specification of the above organ, which is now in course of construction by Messrs. Henry Willis & Sons, of London, Liverpool and Glasgow. As will be seen from the comparisons made on page 26, this splendid instrument will be the largest in the world. It will consist of five manuals, CC to C, 61 notes, and a 'Willis' pedal board, CCC to G, 32 notes, and will comprise 167 speaking stops and 48 couplers, making a total of 215 drawstop knobs.

EXPLANATION OF SPECIFICATION.

This organ, which is now in course of construction for the new Cathedral at Liverpool, is the munificent gift of Mrs. James Barrow, of Waterloo, near Liverpool.

The general internal dimensions of the Cathedral will be:

Total length	460 ft.
Width across Nave and Aisles	88 "
Width across main Transepts	200 "
Height from floor to apex of groining	115 "
Central space	200 ft. long, 88 ft. wide.

Owing to the extreme size of the Cathedral rendering an organ of great magnitude a necessity, the opportunity has been taken, thanks to the generous donor, not merely to construct an instrument of the greatest size and power, but chiefly to obtain a most complete tonal design involving no unnecessary duplication, and to enable every class of legitimate tone to be adequately represented and developed.

It is of the greatest importance that this should be realised, as the first consensus of opinion would most probably be that the organ will be much too large; but when it is borne in mind that an organ of 60 stops is found no more than adequate for many churches of average magnitude, and the sizes of these are compared with the enormous dimensions of the Liverpool Cathedral, it will be readily seen that, even allowing for the increase in scaling of the pipework, the new organ will be, relatively, none too large for the building, and to support the immense congregation which the Cathedral will be capable of accommodating.

The instrument will occupy two special chambers in the first bay on each side of the Chancel, and also a portion of the south Chancel Triforium. There will be four fronts, two into the Chancel and two into the east Transepts, with oak cases designed by the cathedral architect, Mr. G. Gilbert Scott. Each chamber will be (internally) 36 ft. wide, 58 ft. high, and 13 ft. 6 in. deep, the floors being at a height of 21 ft. 3 in. above the Chancel floor.

The Great, Solo, Tuba, and a portion of the Pedal departments will be located in the south chamber, while the Echo organ will also be on this side in the Triforium above. The Swell, Choir, and remainder of the Pedal will be in the north chamber.

There will be six manual departments: Choir, Great, Swell, Solo, Tuba, and Echo. These will be played from five keyboards, the Tuba and Echo organ being both played from the fifth.

In each department, while retaining the various tonal-colours traditionally assigned to it, the endeavour has been to develop these varying classes of tone to the fullest extent in 'families,' so as to ensure correct balance in the departments themselves, as well as in the ensemble.

CHOIR ORGAN.

The generally-accepted modern function of the Choir organ is that it should be somewhat of an echo to the Great, and as such this department has been designed with soft diapason tone, superwork and small chorus reed work, giving the effect of the early English organs, in which 'full organ' was often used to accompany choir voices. At the same time the semi-solo character of the Choir organs of the latter part of the 19th century has not been lost sight of, and the scheme for this department may be said to comprise the advantages of both.

The family of Dulcianas, the real choir Diapason type, has been placed outside the Choir-box, as there will be an enclosed family of this type (the Salicional) on the Swell organ; with the exception of the Dulciana Mixture, which will be enclosed for convenient use with other combinations.

The provision of an enclosed family of Gambas, of the true Choir type, will be most useful, and the Vox Humanas, 16 ft. and 8 ft., have been purposely placed on this manual by virtue of their being quite as much accompanimental as solo stops.

GREAT ORGAN.

This department being the most important factor in the tonal balance of an organ, when the enormous dimensions of the Cathedral are considered, involved a certain amount of deviation from the usual method of designing large instruments.

Six metal 8-ft. diapasons are provided, in two groups. Three of these will be of extreme, but correct, scale, and will speak on a pressure of 10-in., giving an unprecedented quality of tone and power; the other three, although of large size, will represent the older type of diapason tone.

The omission of a Sub-Bourdon 32 ft. will be noticed; this is done purposely, as it would remove the distinction of the Pedal organ from being an octave lower than the manuals, a similar stop on the pedal not being possible, and neither being really desirable additions to a tonal scheme.

The Tibias will be virtually wood Diapasons, but neither these nor any other stop in the organ will have leathern lips. The family of Stopped Diapasons will be a useful addition to the softer accompanimental stops of this department. The mutation work is built up from the sub-unisonal foundation, thus greatly conducing to perfect balance in the fluework.

The stop 'Solo Trombas on Great' will transfer the four enclosed semi-chorus reeds on 20-in. to the Great, to assist the four unenclosed reeds in giving complete balance against the heavy foundation tone; and being also playable from the Solo, they are of considerably more use than if kept as purely Great organ reeds. The fact of their being enclosed enables many unusual and useful effects to be obtained.

SWELL ORGAN.

While the modern view is that, in the Swell, reed tone should predominate as against Diapason tone on a Great organ, in this case the latter tone has not been neglected, and in this department will be amply represented by two full-toned Diapasons, a Tibia, and a family of Geigens, which latter have gradually come to be accepted as the most effective type of Swell Diapason tone. A family of Salicionals (or enclosed Dulcianas) will be placed on this, their proper manual, and both these and a very complete family of Lieblichs, which extend up to a soft Mixture, will provide ample soft and varied foundation work; the Lieblich Mixture will be a novelty, which is fully justified on an instrument of this size, and will also render possible many unusual effects.

The reed-work will be divided into three groups; the Hautboys 16 ft. and 8 ft., and the Krummhorn providing the softer effects, and the family of Cornopes on 10-in. wind will combine their utility in mezzoforte combinations with the power of assisting the family of free-toned Trumpets on 15-in. wind in adequately balancing the heavy Great organ.

SOLO ORGAN.

This department will be on more or less orthodox lines. The greater portion will be enclosed, with the exception of a family of solo Hohl Flötes and the Diapason Stentor on 20-in. wind; the latter will give an effect hitherto unobtainable, by virtue of the scale and treatment. The enclosed portion includes a very complete family of Violes, and a number of orchestral reeds, as well as the family of Trombas on 20-in. wind, previously mentioned in connection with the Great organ.

TUBA ORGAN.

This department will comprise the Tubas usually found on the Solo manual, slightly developed and placed on a separate keyboard, as at St. Paul's Cathedral, forming a 'Clavier des Bombards.' These will include a family of Tubas, 16 ft., 8 ft., 4 ft., two Bombardons, 8 ft., 4 ft., somewhat of the orchestral type, and a 'Tuba Magna' on 50-in. wind.

The latter pressure has, so far, not been employed in England; but owing to the size of the Cathedral, and to the special treatment in voicing on 'Willis' lines, the result will be a quality of tone and power hitherto unheard in this country.

ECHO ORGAN.

This department, also played from the fifth keyboard, although it can be coupled to other manuals for use with softer stops of those departments, will really be a distinct organ, and as such will be complete in itself with a separate Pedal of four stops, superwork, and chorus reeds. The Pedal will be enclosed in the Echo-box, and will include a soft reed, the Dulcian 16-ft. The draw-stops of these will be grouped below those of the Echo manual. All stops of the manual division will naturally be designed to give the effect of distance, apart from the position of this department in the Triforium, and will include a family of Quintatons, soft Diapason, Flutes, &c., and the mutation work will include a stopped Twelfth (Quintatón), and a Flute Mixture, the latter somewhat of a novelty. There will also be a Carillon of four octaves.

The whole of this department, while undoubtedly a luxury, will be a most important adjunct in an organ of this magnitude, and will serve to complete the varied resources at the disposal of the player.

PEDAL ORGAN.

This department, although fulfilling the function of providing appropriate basses to the various classes of tone on the manuals, must also comprise a proper tonal scheme in itself, which in this case will be very complete. A most important innovation will be the provision of a separate pedal Swell-box, although the enclosure of some Pedal basses in a manual box has already been done. The enclosed stops will, of course, provide appropriate basses for the Swell organ, and other enclosed departments; among them will be a Contra-Ophicleide 32 ft. on 15-in. wind. The player will be able to couple the separate crescendo pedal for this box to the various other crescendo pedals for combined use with other departments, thus greatly enhancing the utility of this enclosed division of the Pedal.

The two 32-ft. metal stops will form the Transept fronts on each side. The heavy Diapason tone on the Great will be adequately supported by three wood, and two metal, Opens 16 ft. The softer unenclosed basses will be provided by a Dolce 16 ft. of metal and a Bourdon of wood, the enclosed stopped base (Quintatón) being of metal.

As on the Great organ, the mutation work will be built up from the sub-unisonal foundation, the graver ranks being of stopped pipes. A 64-ft. stop will not be provided, as it is generally recognised that the lower tones are really inaudible; but with regard to the upper portion of the Pedal compass, the Double Quint 2½ ft. will provide an acoustic 64 ft. of considerable utility in combination.

With regard to the reed-work, this will be divided into four groups: there will be a family of Trombones 32 ft., 16 ft., 8 ft., on 25-in. wind, and two reeds of medium power on 15-in.; the enclosed portion will comprise two Ophicleides 32 ft., 16 ft., and Bassoons 16 ft. and 8 ft. for the softer effects.

Until recently, English organs have been constantly criticised on account of the inadequate resources of their Pedal departments as compared with those of Continental organs. While this may have been true in the past, and although there are pedal departments with a greater number of stops in existence, they invariably have not possessed such a proportion of 16-ft. basses, which are the true foundation of this department.

None of the stops of the Pedal or of the manual departments will be derived from, or be extensions of, any other stops. By this it is not intended to disparage legitimate derivation, but this process is, in effect, a means of increasing the resources of an organ in the case of which funds or space will not permit of such enlargement. The reason for the insertion of the Coupler 'solo Trombas on Great,' which might possibly be considered a form of derivation, has already been explained. If various stops in the organ had been derived, knobs would have been provided representing separate stops, and it was the express wish of the designer that the instrument should be absolutely complete in all departments.

COUPLERS, ETC.

These will be grouped together, this arrangement being, in an instrument of this size, preferable to scattering them about under the various departments. It has also purposely been arranged that the octave-couplers should not act through the inter-manual couplers, separate couplers in octaves being provided between the Great and the Swell and Choir organs; the utility of separating these is not always recognised, but for certain effects it is invaluable.

Although played from the same manual, the Tubas and Echo organ will be separately coupled to the various other departments. The advantages of this precaution are obvious. The actions of these two departments will be controlled by draw-stops (Tubas 'on') and (Echo 'on'). The 'tenor solo to pedals' will not only couple the tenor twenty notes of the solo manual to the pedals, but will also silence the Pedal organ in that portion of the Pedal compass, thus enabling solo effects to be obtained with the right foot on a solo stop alone with a normal bass in the lowest octave of the pedal-board.

The accessory stops will comprise drawstops for the four tremulants, and coupling stops for the various combination movements, one of these giving suitable pedal accompaniments to the manual combinations, others enabling the combinations of the various manuals to be concentrated on the combination pedals. The crescendo pedals will be capable of being coupled together (without adding weight to the touch of the pedal) by means of a drawstop.

With regard to the console, the dimensions of this will be to the 'Willis' standard throughout, with the exception of the drawstop knobs, which on account of their large number will be slightly smaller, although of the usual 'Willis' pattern, their diameter being 1½ in. with a draw of 1¼ in.

The drawstops will be arranged in each jamb in four double-columns (i.e., eight vertical columns each side, two single columns to a department). The Swell, Tubas, Echo (and Echo pedal) and the couplers (the latter in two double-columns) will be in the bass jamb. In the treble jamb will be the Pedal, Great, Solo, and Choir departments. Those departments which have certain stops enclosed will have the knobs of the enclosed portions above the unenclosed stops; the separation being clearly indicated by ivory tablets.

The various pedals and pistons for the adjustable combination and other accessory movements have been specially designed to render the control of the great instrument as simple as possible. The couplers will also be capable of being controlled by the pistons of the various departments they augment.

CONCLUSION.

The exceptional size and comprehensiveness of the scheme causes the organ to stand out among recent instruments in this and other countries.

As things are at present, it will be the largest organ in the world, commensurate with the enormous building in which it will be placed; and will be additionally noteworthy as being the first organ of over 100 speaking stops to embody the correct principles of tonal design along with the infinite variety of stops in earlier organs of this size.

While it is neither desirable nor possible to make a fair comparison between the Cathedral organ and other prominent organs in different parts of the world, particulars of some are here appended, as far as can be ascertained. The large organ formerly in the last Exhibition at St. Louis, U.S.A., is not given, as reliable information as to whether it exists in its entirety does not seem to be forthcoming.

The sizes of the various buildings in which these organs are placed should also really be considered, and it is perhaps permissible to mention that the Sydney Town Hall, in which is the organ which has been largest up to the present year, has the following dimensions: length 116 ft., width 85 ft., height 65 ft. These are quoted merely to show that, in view of the much greater dimensions (already given) of the Liverpool Cathedral, the organ which is now in course of construction will be by no means too large.

The organ (without cases) will cost about £18,000, and will take about four years to complete.

The specification has been drawn up by Mr. W. J. Ridley (nephew of Mrs. Barrow). It has the entire approval of the other members of Mrs. Barrow's committee—Mr. F. H. Burtall (Cathedral organist), Mr. Charles Collins, Mr. E. Townshend Driffield, and the builders, Messrs. Henry Willis & Sons.

Reviews.

Pax Dei. A song of rest. For soli, chorus, and orchestra. By E. W. Naylor.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

There are comparatively few works suitable for use in Advent, and for that reason alone Dr. Naylor's setting of the fine words he has chosen (practically a Requiem) will be welcomed. But even after a far from exhaustive analysis we think he has produced something quite new, destined to enhance his reputation and to hold a place in contemporary English sacred music. The work is laid out in some nine or ten movements, many of which are subdivided. Among those which are conspicuous in their treatment may be included the 'Dies Irae,' and the 'Pie Jesu,' while in the 'Offertorium' mention must be made of the vigorous fugal section commencing 'Quam olim Abraham,' which occurs later also in the 'Hostias.' Dr. Naylor may certainly claim to be modern in his harmonic construction, but from so learned a man we are content to receive what he gives us. To be sure there are some passages and progressions which require hearing often and, possibly, need explanation before they become clear. But then all that has happened before in works which have since become classical. There is all the difference between the man who tries to be original and becomes ugly in his means of expression, and he who uses his means with knowledge and conviction. Dr. Naylor gives abundant evidence of sincerity, while his workmanship is such as we should expect from a musician trained in all branches of his art.

Mozart's Opera, 'The Magic Flute.' Translated by Edward J. Dent.

Mozart's Opera, 'The Magic Flute': Its History and Interpretation. By Edward J. Dent.

[Heffer, Cambridge.]

For the performance of Mozart's 'Magic Flute' given at Cambridge in November of last year, Mr. Edward J. Dent made a new translation of the opera, which is here published along with a companion volume dealing with the history and interpretation of the work. The translation is as well done as can be expected, considering the poor quality of the original libretto. The other volume is extremely interesting. Mr. Dent surveys all the existing material dealing with the sources of the libretto, and has no difficulty in showing that the text, so far from being, as was at one time supposed, the work of Mozart's friend the opera-director Schikaneder, was for the most part written by that remarkable person Giesecke. He gives a summary of the Abbé Terrasson's old romance 'Sethos,' and shows that this book, which had a great vogue in its own day, must have been very well known to the author of the text of the 'Magic Flute.' Many of the incidents are the same in both, and in two places the opera makes use of passages from the novel almost word for word. Mr. Dent shows the curious change of purpose that came over the collaborators in the opera at an early stage in its inception, what had been intended for a mere fairy romance, treated in a partly comic vein, being turned into a drama full of the ritual of Freemasonry and aiming at the enforcement of certain moral ideas. Mr. Dent also makes it clear—probably clearer than it has been made by any previous writer—how deeply possessed Mozart was by serious thoughts in the last year or so of his life. The little book is quite indispensable to any student of Mozart and the 'Magic Flute.'

The Paragraph Psalter. By Brooke Foss Westcott, D.D., D.C.L. Revised and edited by A. H. Mann, M.A., Mus.D. Oxon.

[Cambridge University Press.]

It is hardly necessary to say much about this well-known work. It is equally unnecessary to add, though we fain would do so, that at the hands of Dr. Mann it has been accorded reverent and careful treatment in its revision. From one so experienced and successful in all matters appertaining to the Church service the book comes to us with authority even greater than it before possessed, and we cordially recommend it to those to whom Anglican pointing still makes an appeal, in the hope that it may do much to stem the adverse tide of criticism so constantly directed against it.

Five Short Anthems or Introits. By C. Lee Williams.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. In C. By E. Markham Lee.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Lee Williams here adds a welcome contribution to that class of Church music in which simplicity and reverent effect are characteristics. The composer's name is a sufficient guarantee of excellence. Dr. Markham Lee proves himself a true Church musician, for in his setting we find nothing which is not prompted by a regard for orthodox tradition. Here are no startling changes of harmony, no disconnected wanderings after the unknown. All is clear and reasonable, while the organ part is sufficiently subordinated to give the vocal parts their due importance. The slight repetition of some of the words, though perhaps better avoided, surely need meet with no objection. The work is dedicated to Sir Frederick Bridge.

Richard Wagner: Sämtliche Schriften und Dichtungen—Volks-Ausgabe.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel are making slow but steady progress with their popular edition of Wagner's prose and poetical works. The fifth and sixth parts, recently issued, carry us as far as 'The Art-work of the Future' (1849). At this rate it will apparently be some time before the whole twenty-four parts are published; and as there must be many people to whom a cheap edition of the later prose works of Wagner would be a boon, the publishers will perhaps consider the advisability of accelerating the issue.

The Communion Service (with Benedictus and Agnus Dei). In C. By H. M. Higgins.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Written evidently by an experienced Church musician, this setting may be recommended for its thoughtful treatment and simple but effective choral writing. The organ accompaniment will require study, and an organ of refined and responsive mechanism. The work should become widely known and used.

Obituary.

We regret to have to announce the following deaths :

Mr. EDWIN ASHDOWN, on November 26, founder of the firm of Ashdown, music-publishers (formerly Ashdown & Parry). He was also the originator of the house of Leonard & Co. For many years he was chairman of the Music Publishers' Association. His was a genial and arresting personality, which endeared him to all his many friends. He died in the eighty-sixth year of his age, leaving no fewer than fifty direct descendants.

Mr. ALBERT B. BACH, a well-known and greatly-respected professor of singing. He died suddenly, of acute angina pectoris, on November 19. Mr. Bach was born at Gyula, Hungary, in 1844, and he settled in Edinburgh about thirty years ago. We hope to be able to refer in our next number to his useful career.

A CORRECTION.

In our last issue—misled by an unfortunate error in a contemporary—we stated that Madame Susanna Cole had died. We very much regret the mistake, and any inconvenience occasioned thereby, and at the same time we desire to express our satisfaction that Madame Cole is still alive. Our high appreciation of her services to the art was shown in the sketch of her career given in our October issue.

REGIMENTAL BANDS—THEIR HISTORY AND ROLE OF USEFULNESS.

On December 11, Lieut. J. Mackenzie Rogan, M.V.O., Mus Doc, bandmaster of the Coldstream Guards, and senior bandmaster of the Brigade of Guards, gave a lecture on the above subject at Queen's Hall before a large and distinguished audience. Field-Marshal Lord Roberts presided.

Lieut. Rogan, in the course of an historical survey of the development of military music, said :

The British Army dates from 1660, and though the development of martial music for many years was slow, provision for certain instrumentalists was made at the very beginning. The historical records of the Life Guards record that at the Restoration, in 1660, Charles II. was met by the King's Life Guards with their kettle-drums and trumpets, and in the warrant for the formation of the Tangiers Regiment (now the Queen's Royal West Surrey Regiment) in 1661, provision is made for two drummers per company, with pay at 1s. a day. The official establishment of musicians for a line regiment remained at two drummers per company, and two fifers per regiment, until 1803.

The introduction of wind instruments and the formation of regimental bands was a gradual process entirely dependent on the initiative and generosity of the officers.

The oboe was the first instrument introduced into our service to supplement the drums and fifes, and a warrant of 1684 authorized the employment of twelve oboes in the regiments of Foot Guards. Line regiments followed this example, and the introduction of the oboe may therefore be regarded as the starting point of regimental bands.

Germany at this period led the way in military music, and small bands of four to six performers of German origin were engaged by regiments at the expense of officers.

The first record we have of attested soldiers being employed as musicians in a regimental band is that of the Coldstream Guards, for whom, in 1785, H.R.H. the Duke of York enlisted twelve musicians in Hanover; one of these men received the appointment of 'Music-Major.' Prior to that date musicians had been hired by the month to play the King's Guard from the Horse Guards Parade to St. James's Palace. The music played was of the simplest kind, and only march music was used.

Military bands owe much to that great soldier, Frederick the Great, who was one of the first to realise the value of military bands in popularizing military measures. Under him Germany was the first to establish uniform military bands.

Increasing interest brought about the introduction of new instruments. Gradually clarinets, horns, trumpets, flutes, bassoons, and serpents were added. The clarinet replaced the oboe as a leading instrument, and is now as important to the military band as is the violin to the orchestra.

Towards the end of the 18th century regimental bands had become almost universal, though their establishment and maintenance still remained voluntary on the part of officers.

The development of the military spirit in France under the first Napoleon led to great improvements in military bands, a subject to which he gave much attention. He held that 'music, of all liberal arts, has the greatest influence over the passions, and is that to which the legislator ought to give the greatest encouragement.'

The association of our Army with the allied forces on the Continent, and with the French Army after 1815, assisted in the progress of our own bands, though this progress was not at the public expense.

In 1822 the authorized establishment of regimental bands was fixed at ten musicians, not including black men or boys, and in 1823 this number, to meet the requirements of new instruments, was increased to fourteen.

From this time onward until the Crimean period, though music was looked upon as a necessity, it was left to look after itself in haphazard fashion. There was no system of training Army musicians, and no uniformity among those who directed them. Each band had its own musical pitch, and the discordant result of a performance of the National Anthem by combined bands at a review of our troops at Scutari, in 1854, was a masterly example of our ineptitude and inefficiency in military band training and organization.

Happily, at the close of the Crimean war, the attention of H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge was drawn to our want of military musical organization; the result was the establishment of the Royal Military School of Music at Kneller Hall. At this period the men in charge of our Army bands were invariably civilians, and the majority were foreigners. These were gradually replaced by British musicians (drawn mainly from regimental bands) who, after being trained at the school, were sent to regiments as bandmasters. Among these early graduates were some of our most able bandmasters, and our indebtedness to them is great, for they were the men who laid the foundations of our successful military bands of to-day.

VALUE OF MILITARY BANDS TO THE ARMY.

The establishment of the band of a line battalion is fixed at one sergeant, one corporal, and twenty musicians. It goes without saying that no regimental band can be kept efficient with these numbers. How then are regimental bands recruited and maintained?

- i. By the enlistment of boys either already trained as musicians, or to be trained as such.
- ii. By taking men from the ranks.
- iii. By training efficient soldiers as acting bandsmen to supplement the authorized establishment.

But even then the source of supply is limited, and a commanding officer has many difficulties to contend with. One, and not by any means the least, is the limited promotion open to bandsmen. The educational abilities and the intelligence required to make a skilled musician are the same as those required by the non-commissioned officer. A youth who joins the band sees his comrade, without superior ability, who remains in the ranks, rise gradually to non-commissioned rank, perhaps in six or seven years to colour-serjeant, with the prospect of further promotion to a warrant or to a commission. The bandsman's prospects are limited to the chance of promotion to band serjeant or band corporal. He becomes dissatisfied, and either takes his discharge or commits a military offence to obtain relegation to the ranks; and so the band loses a trained musician. It may be suggested that Kneller Hall opens up prospects for Army bandsmen, but the proportion of bandmasters to the number of men and boys who enter bands is very small.

I see no remedy for this state of affairs, but I know from experience that the trouble is a real one. A suggestion has recently been put forward that regimental bands could satisfactorily be replaced by forming divisional or stationary bands.

The King's Regulations stipulate that the non-commissioned officers and men of regimental bands shall be effective soldiers, perfectly trained and liable to serve in the ranks. In addition, they are trained as stretcher-bearers and in 'first-aid.' What economy either in men or money would then be effected by the substitution of stationary divisional bands for the present regimental bands? The present regimental bandsmen would become divisional bandsmen. Their places as stretcher-bearers with their battalions on service would be taken by men from the ranks, and the fighting line would be correspondingly reduced in strength.

As for the bands themselves, it would be many years before, say, the 1st Aldershot Divisional Band had the same pride in its existence as the existing band of any battalion, with its share of regimental tradition and its pride in everything appertaining to the regiment.

It is at most Colonial stations and in India that regimental bands more strikingly evidence their value.

Those of you who have experienced Indian summers at Dinapore, Allahabad, Jhansi, Cawnpore, and similar stations, with the thermometer, in the shade, hovering at the three-figure mark, for at least two or three months of the year, will appreciate the enlivenment of the 'Long, long Indian day,' when the regimental band at the station bandstand or in the regimental gardens towards the close of day, discourses the latest music from home. The band performances vary the dreary monotony of cantonment life and help to dispel the depression consequent thereon. Their effect upon the general health and tone of the troops is incalculable. During epidemics of cholera or fever I have known funerals so frequent that the attendance of the band has been dispensed with. Instead, daily programmes of light and lively music have acted as a wholesome tonic to the community, and in many cases have helped to restrain the men from indulgence in drink and other excesses.

Again, the services of a band for amusement and relaxation at stations, where the troops are entirely or almost entirely dependent upon themselves, are invaluable. Dances, concerts, theatrical performances, and entertainments of every description are practically dependent upon the band for their success, while cricket, football, polo, and gymkhanas owe much to the assistance of regimental bands. Church services are in many stations dependent upon bands for the musical portion of the service.

In the Illustrated London News of March 3, 1855, there is a picture of a French band playing in the camp before Sebastopol, and the text accompanying the engraving reads:

'The French have shown their superiority to the English in the attention they have paid to the maintenance of their military bands, as in everything else. While the English camp has been for months without any attempt to cheer the hearts of the men with inspiring martial airs, our more mercurial neighbours have kept up the regular practice of the bands, which has had an excellent effect upon the soldiers.'

In my own experience during the operations in Upper Burma between 1886 and 1888, the bandsmen had to discard their instruments and do duty in the ranks. We still, however, maintained the band and practised when opportunity offered. It has frequently happened that, after returning to camp from expeditions against dacoits extending over a week or ten days, bandsmen have been called upon to take part in a concert or entertainment to cheer their comrades in camp, and have willingly given their services.

An old colleague, now serving at the Duke of York's School, who had a long Indian experience, and who served through both phases of the Afghan war of 1878-80, in recounting his experiences, has told me that though the band of his regiment—the 67th, now the 2nd Battalion Hampshire Regiment—were returned to the ranks on leaving Kohat for the Kurram, they managed to retain their instruments and a certain amount of music. The bandsmen did double duty during the campaign, and when, after the Cavagnari massacre, the force eventually reached Kabul, it was with colours flying and band playing that the regiment marched into the city. Then, while cantoned in Kabul, the band, though still doing duty in the ranks, kept entertainments going, played at sports, assisted at church services, and generally livened the force. He also instanced the services of the band in a cholera epidemic at Allahabad in 1891, when, for five months, his battalion was in cholera camp forty miles from cantonments and ten miles from the line of rail.

The usefulness of regimental bands from a recruiting point of view is another important factor.

VALUE OF MILITARY BANDS TO THE PUBLIC.

The high appreciation of our regimental bands, so far as the general public is concerned, is exemplified by the many calls upon their services, made by municipalities and corporations for performances, especially during the summer months.

It is no uncommon thing for bands to play to audiences of 5,000 or 10,000 people in the parks of provincial towns. Local brass bands are unable to equal our standards, and the public prefer the better music of the military bands.

We have some of the finest orchestras in the world in London, but their fine performances can only be enjoyed by those who can afford to pay to hear them. To the poorer members of society the high-class concert-hall and the opera-house are closed. The performances of regimental bands in public places are their only opportunities of making acquaintance with much that is best in music.

In India and in many of the Dominions and Dependencies it is practically impossible to obtain a knowledge of good music and musical progress except through the agency of regimental bands. The regimental bands of the Army have done more to raise the standard of musical taste in this country, in India, and our Colonies, than all the orchestras put together.

It is surprising how the popularity of the regimental bands has increased during the past twenty-five years, and there is a marked advance in the class of music played. True it is that most of the music consists mainly of arrangements of the great masters and others, but this is in a large measure due to the fact that composers have not written directly for military bands. Much has been written and said on this subject. In my course of three lectures at the Royal United Services Institution and the Royal Academy of Music, I dwelt strongly on the subject, and I went so far as to say that if the British composer would take the matter in hand, I, for one, would be glad and willing to give all the assistance possible, by having the compositions tested and rehearsed.

I think the reason this matter does not receive the attention it merits is that scoring for military bands is not taught in our great musical institutions. Military bands have frequently been attacked in a few of the London newspapers for playing music that has been arranged for them from orchestral scores. I venture to say that much of this class of music improves by being played on a good military band. If the music is well arranged, well balanced, good proportions of tone-colour maintained, and artistically and intelligently rendered, then I think there is little else to be desired.

A young composer should realise that the military band is one of the best means by which his music can—and in many cases does—become known. It offers him one of the best and most profitable markets, and in many cases it is practically the only way in which his name and work will become known, as it frequently happens that his orchestral compositions are played, as such, not more than once or twice a year, and often not that.

A matter largely affecting the efficiency of regimental bands is the endeavour to maintain a string band in addition to the wind band. I cannot but think it a pity that so much valuable time is expended on the former, when the majority of bands have but little time at their disposal for the practice of the latter, the band paid for out of public funds.

A good wind band can play quite as softly and effectively as a string band. I speak from a long and varied experience in India and in South Africa. In India the band I was in charge of—that of The Queen's Regiment—provided the orchestra for the performances of 'The Mikado,' 'Dorothy,' 'Pinafore,' and works of a similar character. The instruments used were all of the wind family, excepting a string bass and a pianoforte.

I know from personal experience also that the expense of maintaining the two bands in battalions of the line is great. I served with a regiment that organized a string band. It had at the time a very excellent wind or military band, but so much attention had to be devoted to the strings that in a few years the wind band depreciated. This, together with the expense involved in keeping two bands going, caused the officers to give up the string band.

The military wind band is the only one recognised by the authorities.

For quite a considerable period during the last century the military or regimental bands provided the wind instrumentalists at most of the theatres in London, and the whole of the wind department of the orchestra at the Royal Italian Opera at one period consisted of Army musicians.

As evidence of the power of music upon people in a mass, I should like to record my experience of the tour which the Coldstream Guards Band made in Canada in the year 1903.

The enthusiasm displayed by the people in the various cities and towns was something to remember. From the Imperial point of view it was more than a success, it was a veritable triumph. In out-of-the-way towns where a military band was almost unknown, and where the programmes were more simple and patriotic than classical, it was no uncommon sight to see people moved to tears by the strains of some beautiful old English, Irish, Scotch, or Welsh melody. The effect of 'Home, sweet home,' 'Oft in the still night,' 'Auld Robin Gray,' and such like melodies, was such that I felt not only the band but also the audience under the control of my baton. Whole audiences would sometimes stand up in the middle of a programme and demand the National Anthem or 'Rule, Britannia.' Such was the enthusiasm and loyalty of the Canadian people.

In our service regimental bands no longer accompany their battalions as bands into the field, but the following extract from a report of the fighting in the early stage of the war in Turkey shows that in some cases bands are still to be found on the battlefield:

'To the strains of the "Slivinitza March," infantry regiment after infantry regiment of the Bulgarian Army advanced with bayonets to the charge.'

Had present-day regulations obtained a hundred-and-twenty years ago, the West Yorkshire Regiment would not have had the unique distinction of using the old French revolutionary air, 'Ca Ira,' as their regimental march. The circumstances, quoted from the Romance of Regimental Marches, are as follows:

'When, on May 23, 1793, the allied forces stormed the French camp at Famars, the 14th Regiment, finding their work a little too hot for them, began to fall back, and the prospects of the assailants were but gloomy. The moment was one of supreme gravity. The English were losing courage, while the Frenchmen were gaining it, and were keeping up their spirits with the music of the "Ca Ira." Suddenly a brilliant thought entered the mind of the Colonel of the 14th. He dashed to the front once more, commanded his band to strike up the revolutionary air, shouted, "Come on, lads, and we'll beat 'em to their own damned tune," and headed his regiment to a final and triumphant assault. From that day to this the battalions of the West Yorkshire Regiment have played "Ca Ira" as their quickstep.'

It is calculated that in European armies there are now about 1,500 bands, and taking an average of forty men per band the numbers for the whole work out at 60,000.

It will be remembered that for purposes of economy the Government of France some years ago abolished their bands. This innovation was so unpopular both with the Army and the people that the bands were soon reinstated.

Lord Roberts, in thanking Lieut. Rogan, remarked that he was proud to call him an Irishman.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie said: Lord Roberts, Ladies and Gentlemen.—How a peaceful lamb of a musician feels amid such lion-like surroundings I must leave to your imagination.

It is a privilege to be allowed to thank the lecturer for his most able paper on a subject on which no one is better fitted or entitled to speak by long experience, as well as by his prominent position not only in the military service but in the service of music. I came here in search of information, and have certainly not been disappointed. It was time for some expert to give an historical exhibition of the early beginnings and the growth of British military music, because it has developed from its initial purposes and uses far beyond its original intentions, and in course of time taken its place as an active factor in the progress of music, to be reckoned with and recognised to a much greater extent than, maybe, some of us civilians who are working to the same end and for the same object, have done. By the improvements and refinements which our regimental bands have gradually undergone, their executive powers have attained a standard of perfection which deserves highest praise and admiration. In some special cases, this executive ability touches a point which is quite astounding. But that advance has brought something even more valuable and gratifying to us: and that is the extraordinary selection of high-class music, which has not only been made possible, but which, to the great credit of the bandmasters, is being fully taken advantage of. Their programmes now contain much of the best, worthiest, and most difficult pieces by the great composers of all nationalities. Some years ago—perhaps not so many, either—the same compliment could hardly have been paid as honestly and sincerely as I can offer it now. I do not know whether the military authorities will appreciate so fully as we musicians do the fact that the Army bands have now achieved a foremost position—not as mere contributors to amusement and enjoyment, but as valuable popular educators. Their influence is probably more practically useful and effective in that respect than any other means that could be devised for bringing good music to the ears of a huge mass of people, who otherwise would never have learned to love it, as assuredly they do, when they get the chance of hearing it. We owe to the Army bands a great deal more of the immense improvement in the public taste and understanding of the art all over the country than has ever been acknowledged or given credit for. It is so obvious that I will not dwell upon it further, except to thank those in command of the admirable bands for marching with the times, and for the results of their by no means easily accomplished labours. Interested as I am in all this, I have the pleasure of accepting an annual invitation from our sister institution at Kneller Hall, and invariably come away very much impressed by the successful efforts made by the authorities in this direction, and the excellent work done by the students there. On the occasion of the International Musical Congress in London, a couple of years ago, we were anxious to show every department of English music at its best, and the Coldstreamers kindly gave an International programme, about which much genuinely-meant praise was spoken at the time, and written afterwards, by our distinguished guests in their foreign newspapers and magazines. Indeed, I am not sure whether Dr. Rogan did not come off better than any of us! I fancy that his jacket was almost the only one in which no holes were picked. Never mind! There is no such thing as jealousy in my profession, and we have forgiven him long ago. (Much laughter.) Clearly, then, ours may vie with the bands of any country; we are proud of them. And I will go further, and say that it would be a positive disaster to music in this country if ever anything were to happen to disturb or check the splendid work they are doing so efficiently. (Cheers.)

In order to compare the military band of to-day with that of 120 years ago, a special band had been organized by Mr. P. F. Battishill. The instruments, lent for the occasion by the Rev. F. W. Galpin, of Harlow, included oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, and side-drums. They played four pieces, Handel's March from 'Scipio,' the old slow march of the 43rd Light Infantry, a march from Mozart's 'Figaro,' and the 'British Grenadiers.' And the band of the Coldstream Guards played the same pieces with modern instrumentation.

THE VINCENT WALLACE CENTENARY.

During the last week of November, celebrations in honour of the centenary of the birth of William Vincent Wallace were held in Waterford, Cork, Dublin, and Dundalk. At each of these four centres, Dr. Grattan Flood delivered the Centenary appreciation, and there were musical illustrations from 'Maritana,' 'Lurline,' 'The Amber Witch,' and 'Love's Triumph,' as well as pianoforte selections by the lecturer. At Dundalk the lecture-concert was a great success, and the chair was taken by his Eminence Cardinal Logue, who travelled specially from Armagh to preside.

In addition to these celebrations there were four performances of 'Maritana' at Waterford, and the opera was admirably produced by local amateurs, with the aid of Mr. Henry Beaumont, who at a moment's notice kindly took the place of Mr. John Child as Don Cesar de Bazan. As a result of the celebrations a statue of Wallace is to be erected in Waterford, the composer's native city.

THE LATE MR. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR AND MESSRS. NOVELLO & CO.

The following letters appeared in The Times recently :

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE TIMES.'

SIR,—An appeal is being made for the widow and children of the late Mr. Coleridge-Taylor. It seems pertinent to inquire why a composer who wrote so widely successful a composition as 'Hiawatha,' a work which is frequently performed all over England and America, should have left so little provision for his family.

The Society of Authors having noticed the case, and being anxious to help the dependents of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor as far as possible, have inquired from Messrs. Novello & Co. whether 'Hiawatha' produced a royalty for the composer and his heirs. This question the firm has answered by saying that the copyright of all the late Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's compositions has been assigned to themselves. Here we have an admirable example of the trouble that may and often does follow upon the outright sale of literary or artistic property. It cannot be too clearly said that, because of the uncertainty of the value of this property, its outright sale must be attended with risk either to the creator of the work or to its purchaser. One or other party to such bargains is bound to suffer, and it is our experience at the Society of Authors that it is the author of the work who is generally disappointed by the result of the disposal of copyright. But whatever be the outcome of any particular transaction, a system is bad in business which by its capricious event leaves behind it either a recollection of pecuniary loss with the publisher or a deep sense of injustice with the author. There is not one way, and one way only, of publishing that ought to be followed, and in special circumstances the outright sale of a work is the natural sequel to the terms of the commission for writing it. But in all the usual circumstances, and especially in the case of young writers and composers, the disposal of copyright is to be absolutely avoided, and the royalty system should be adopted. Under the royalty system the author shares in any fortune that may attend his work, and the publisher will neither lose money by the purchase of property that brings him in no adequate return, nor be faced with the delicate task of giving as a present to an author some portion of the money that would have accrued to the author under an intelligent sharing of interests.

The Society of Authors understand that Mr. Coleridge-Taylor was refused a royalty and was given only small sums for conveying to Messrs. Novello and Co. the copyright of 'Hiawatha.' That is the state of the case as communicated to the committee of management of the Society, whose opinion is that if a reasonable royalty on the sales of 'Hiawatha' had been forthcoming it would have provided sufficient money for the dependents without any appeal to the public.

It is for the composer's memory as a hard-working and careful man that the public should know that he did provide with his brains a work which, under the royalty method of dealing with literary and artistic property, would have supported his family after his death, while making him more comfortable during his life.

I am, yours faithfully,

S. SQUIRE SPRIGGE, Chairman of the Committee of Management of the Society of Authors.

39, Old Queen Street, Storey's Gate, S.W.,
November 22.

SIR,—Our attention has been called to a letter in your issue of yesterday's date in which Dr. S. Squire Sprigge makes certain recommendations with reference to the publishing of authors' works on the royalty system, and incidentally commits himself to certain statements reflecting upon the terms on which we publish works by the late S. Coleridge-Taylor.

We do not quarrel with Dr. Sprigge's recommendations. The royalty system is one which we adopted over forty years ago, and of which we have ever since made constant use in suitable cases. There are, however, numerous cases where the composer prefers to sell his copyright absolutely, without any royalty or reservation; and it is characteristic of young and unknown composers that they usually desire to sell their works outright. We are in the habit generally of publishing on whichever footing the composer prefers; but we do not admit that, where a publisher purchases a work outright and is fortunate enough to avoid a loss, there is any ground for suggesting that an 'injustice' is thereby inflicted upon the composer, unless Dr. Sprigge considers that where loss results to the publisher he also is the victim of an 'injustice.'

As regards his statements, Dr. Sprigge's letter is both misleading and inaccurate. The author of a work on 'Methods of Publishing' ought not to have invited your readers to draw the inference that, because a composer assigns the copyright of his work, he necessarily deprives himself of all further pecuniary interest in it. It is true that Coleridge-Taylor assigned to us the copyright of all his works published by us (not the copyright of all his compositions, as inaccurately stated by Dr. Sprigge), but he retained a royalty interest in many of them.

The statement, 'as communicated to the committee' of Dr. Sprigge's Society, that Coleridge-Taylor was refused a royalty on 'Hiawatha' is untrue. He accepted gladly the terms that were offered to him. Moreover, he from time to time offered us the copyright of every similar work that he ever wrote. There are six of them. The first three he sold outright; the later (and more successful) ones all bear royalties. He therefore was a typical instance of the young composer who prefers to sell outright until he has made a reputation, and who thereafter prefers the royalty system.

We are, Sir, yours faithfully,

NOVELLO & Co., Ltd.
160, Wardour Street, W., November 27.

SIR,—Messrs. Novello and Co. describe my letter published in your issue of November 26 as misleading and inaccurate. It was true and to the point. Incidentally it was directed mainly to the broad issues of just publishing and not to the pecuniary arrangements between Messrs. Novello & Co. and the late Mr. Coleridge-Taylor; but the outcome of these arrangements having become a public question, owing to an appeal being made to the public in behalf of the dependents of the late Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, perhaps his publishers are right in discussing their relations with the dead composer.

They say that Mr. Coleridge-Taylor was not refused a royalty and 'accepted gladly the terms that were offered to him.' We are informed that he was refused a royalty. Messrs. Novello & Co. say that Mr. Coleridge-Taylor 'was a typical instance of the young composer who prefers to sell outright until he has made a reputation.' The second and third parts of 'Hiawatha' were written after he had made an enormous reputation by the publication of the first part.

Both Messrs. Novello & Co. and I were talking of works published by their firm—no others could be in question. I refer them to their letter to me of November 16. In the 'Methods of Publishing,' written more than twenty years ago, I am glad to find that the position of the author who, having assigned his copyright, still enjoys a pecuniary interest in his work, is described at full length. Messrs. Novello & Co. suggest otherwise, or their allusion to my ancient little book is meaningless.

What the public would like to know—as Messrs. Novello & Co. have brought this aspect of the matter prominently forward—is, How much the composer received for 'Hiawatha' (whether he sold his property gladly or not); and how much the publishers have received and are receiving by publishing the same work.

I am, yours faithfully,

S. SQUIRE SPRIGGE.
November 28.

SIR,—Messrs. Novello & Co. ought to be more accurate in the statements they have made in reply to the admirable letter of the chairman of the Society of Authors. When they state that Coleridge-Taylor 'was a typical instance of the young composer who prefers to sell outright until he has made a reputation' they have had a lapse of memory which can be corrected by a reference to their correspondence records.

When Coleridge-Taylor was a scholar of the Royal College of Music he composed a Ballade for Violin and Orchestra (Op. 5), which Sir George Grove and I considered worthy of publication, and he sent it to Messrs. Novello. They offered to publish it on his assigning to them the copyright in return for a few (I think it was twenty) copies of the work when published. He wrote a letter, of which Sir George Grove and I thoroughly approved, admitting that as a beginner he did not expect to be paid for the copyright, but asking Messrs. Novello if they would agree to name the number of copies the sale of which would fully cover all expenses of publication, and after these were sold, to give him a royalty. This the firm refused to do in a letter which I held in my hand, of which I well remember the contents, and of which Messrs. Novello, having, of course, a copy in their books, will, no doubt, present the public with a faithful transcript. It amply explained the reason why young composers, with the glamour of print before their eyes, too often have to accept (gladly?) such terms as are offered to them. 'Hiawatha' was published in two sections. The first, 'Hiawatha's Wedding,' the composer (gladly, of course) sold outright. For how much? Will Messrs. Novello deny that he asked for a royalty on Parts 2 and 3 in consequence of the great success of Part 1, and was refused it? What were the terms which he gladly accepted, and what were the profits which Messrs. Novello, no less gladly, have made? Do they number 'Hiawatha' amongst his less successful works? When the public are in possession of these easily ascertainable facts, they will be in a position to judge of the situation.

If the terms were just, as Messrs. Novello imply, their publication can only rebound to the reputation of the firm. If the terms are withheld, they cannot complain if the British public draws its own conclusions from the specimen of outright sale which I have given above, and from the sum of £800 odd at which probate of the composer's estate was sworn.—Yours faithfully,

CHARLES V. STANFORD.

SIR,—Sir Charles Stanford having appeared in this correspondence, we may conclude that he is the informant referred to twice by Dr. Sprigge. We will pass over Dr. Sprigge's letter appearing in your issue of Saturday, as it calls for no reply, and we will deal with that of Sir Charles Stanford dated November 28. Sir Charles Stanford is perfectly correct in stating that we agreed to publish Coleridge-Taylor's Ballade in D for violin and orchestra, and that we acquired the copyright in exchange for a number of copies of the work. The composer consulted his guardian and Dr. Hubert Parry, and on January 11, 1895, wrote the head of our publishing office that they advised him to agree to these terms. On January 21, 1895, we received a letter in which the composer definitely stated that he wished us to publish on the terms suggested. Here therefore we have a contract completed to the satisfaction of all parties—the composer on the one side, backed by his guardian and one of the professors of his college, and ourselves on the other. On February 1 of the same year the head of our publishing office received a letter from the composer (presumably the letter referred to by Sir Charles Stanford as having received the thorough approval of Sir George Grove and himself), from which we quote the following:

'I am writing you an account of a most awkward complication that has arisen regarding my Violin Ballade. As you are aware, Dr. Parry advised me to accept your terms of publication as they stood, and I therefore did so. Unhappily, however, Dr. Stanford (whom I am studying with) sees fit to interfere and make it most uncomfortable for me. . . . He says that there can be no possible objection to my asking you (or rather Novello's) to grant me a small royalty on each copy (if there are enough copies sold) after you have paid expenses. Of course, this is nothing whatever to do with you, as I have already agreed to your conditions.'

On receipt of this communication we wrote on February 5 the letter of which Sir Charles Stanford sarcastically asks us to present the public with a faithful transcript. It was as follows:

'In reply to your letter of the 1st inst. addressed to our Mr. Jaeger, we regret being unable to alter our terms for publishing your Ballade. We would in fact much prefer your publishing the piece elsewhere, and we shall therefore destroy the plates which we have already engraved.'

Thus declining to reopen at the bidding of Sir Charles Stanford a contract deliberately entered into, but at the same time offering to annul it.

To this the composer replied on February 7:

'Please do not destroy the plates of my Violin Ballade. I am afraid my last letter was misunderstood. I only wanted to tell Dr. Stanford that I had asked you what he desired and also the result, therefore do kindly go on with the printing.'

Our answer to this on the same day was as follows:

'At your special wish and request we will continue the printing of your Violin Ballade, and will publish it on the terms originally agreed between us. Of course, if you choose to pay the cost of printing we would publish the work for you and you would receive all profits which might result.'

Again you will note our offer to annul the contract. On the same day the composer writes again:

'DEAR SIRS.—I have much pleasure in accepting your offer of twenty-five copies of the piano arrangement of my Violin Ballade in exchange for the copyright.'

Here the correspondence ends, and the work was duly published.

Was it the glamour of print which induced Coleridge-Taylor to accept our terms? Was it not rather the desire to place his work before the public under favourable circumstances and to get his name known? Sir Charles Stanford assigned to us the copyright of his No. 4 Symphony, Op. 31, and his Suite for violin and orchestra, Op. 32, for the sum of one shilling, having induced us to publish by presenting us with the copyright of four part-songs. Later on—indeed, within a few months of the Coleridge-Taylor contract—Sir Charles Stanford persuaded us to publish his Trio in E flat, Op. 35, without exacting any fee or royalty whatsoever, by presenting us with the copyright of his Morning and Communion Service in A. Are we to be taken to task because we formed the same opinion of Coleridge-Taylor's Op. 4 as Sir Charles Stanford himself formed of his own Opp. 31, 32, and 35?

In reply to Sir Charles Stanford's question, 'Will Messrs. Novello deny that he asked for a royalty on Parts 2 and 3 in consequence of the great success of Part 1 of 'Hiawatha' and was refused it?' the answer is in the affirmative. The question of a royalty in connection with this work, either as a whole or in part, was never raised.—Yours faithfully,

NOVELLO & Co., Ltd.

December 3.

SIR,—Messrs. Novello have not answered the two main questions about 'Hiawatha': whether they number it amongst his less successful works, and what and where are the profits in which the composer should have had a share.

It is obvious from the extracts of correspondence which they have printed (1) that the letter of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor of February 1, 1895, is not the document to which I referred; (2) that Messrs. Novello did refuse a royalty, advised him to go elsewhere, and announced their intention of destroying the plates if the royalty were insisted upon: a sufficient deterrent to any young composer who (naturally) wished to keep on good terms with the firm and hoped for better things in future.

I need scarcely say that the letter I saw, which asked for the royalty, was, as far as my cognizance went, previous to any agreement on the part of the composer to assign the copyright in return for twenty-five copies, and must therefore be of earlier date than the letters printed by Messrs. Novello. I would never be a party to the repudiation of a signed contract.

The cloud of personalities with which Messrs. Novello have sought to conceal the main issue, 'Hiawatha', it is not necessary for me to deal with further than to say that their version is precisely the reverse of the facts.

My works to which they allude were offered to Messrs. Novello (at that time my publishers) in the usual way; they only accepted them on the condition that I helped to pay for them with more gratuitous brain-work. The Trio in E flat was published, not 'within a few months of the Coleridge-Taylor contract,' but six years previously. I have Von Bülow's letter acknowledging the printed copy (it was dedicated to him), dated December 5, 1889. This is a sufficient comment on Messrs. Novello's accuracy of statement.

But these matters are not to the point. The question is 'Hiawatha,' its profits, and where they went, and the grounds upon which the appeal to the public for the composer's family has been rendered necessary at all. This Messrs. Novello do not answer, and the public can now draw its own conclusions.—Yours faithfully,

CHARLES V. STANFORD.

50, Holland Street, Kensington, W.,
December 4.

SIR,—We note with satisfaction that in Sir Charles Stanford's reply, appearing in your issue of to-day, he apparently abandons the statements, originally made by Dr. Sprigge, and subsequently adopted by himself in the form of a question, that Coleridge-Taylor was refused a royalty on 'Hiawatha'—we may therefore conclude that he admits the inaccuracy of the suggestion.

Sir Charles Stanford states that he would 'never be a party to the repudiation of a signed contract.' Every one who knows Sir Charles will be quite convinced of the truth of that statement. Having regard, however, to the facts disclosed in Coleridge-Taylor's letter of February 1, 1895, addressed to the head of our publishing office, it would appear that Sir Charles's advice to Coleridge-Taylor, with reference to the 'Ballade' contract, was not altogether well considered, for it might have led that young composer to repudiate his contract.

We once more assert emphatically that no royalty on Coleridge-Taylor's 'Ballade' was either asked for or refused, until after a contract had been made. If it is obvious, from the extracts of the correspondence printed in our previous letter, that the letter of February 5 is not the document to which Sir Charles referred, we can only say that we wrote no other answering his description, and that the correspondence as filed in our office is in itself absolutely complete.

We owe Sir Charles Stanford an apology in regard to our statement that, within a few months of the Coleridge-Taylor contract, Sir Charles himself had persuaded us to publish his Trio (Op. 35) by presenting us with the copyright of his Morning and Communion Service in A. This is incorrect. As Sir Charles says, his Trio was published in 1889, on November 13 of that year, to be exact. The publication of the Trio, however, did not complete the transaction. Sir Charles had still to deliver the manuscript of his Morning and Communion Service in A, and that he did not do till nearly five years afterwards—viz., on September 27, 1894. He executed the assignment of the copyright on the following day; and that was the transaction which we ought to have referred to as having taken place within a few months of the Coleridge-Taylor contract.

We do not understand Sir Charles's reference to 'the cloud of personalities' which he says we introduced to conceal 'the main issue.' He invited us to present the public with a faithful transcript of a certain letter. To make that letter intelligible we had necessarily to quote from the previous correspondence. The personalities, at all events, were not ours, and the whole subject of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Ballade' was introduced by Sir Charles.

Neither do we understand Sir Charles's view of 'the main issue.' According to our view, 'the main issue' is that originally put forward by Dr. Sprigge, that Coleridge-Taylor was refused a royalty on 'Hiawatha,' and we regard everything else that has been introduced into this correspondence as irrelevant to that issue. We were interested only in controverting statements of alleged facts—first as regards the supposed refusal to grant a royalty on 'Hiawatha,' and secondly as regards a similar statement by Sir Charles as regards the 'Ballade.' We think that we have now disposed of both statements.

If Sir Charles Stanford supposes that we are likely to gratify his curiosity as to what and where are the profits made by us with reference to 'Hiawatha' or any other of our publications, we are afraid that we must disappoint him. As business men we do not feel called upon to disclose the secrets of our business to him, or to any one else. We regard all questions addressed to us on such matters, whether they are directed to profits or losses, as entirely improper, and we resent them, as we are sure Sir Charles Stanford would if a question were addressed to him inviting him to disclose the amounts of the emoluments derived by him from his professorship at the Royal College of Music, and to account for his application of them.—Yours faithfully,

NOVELLO & Co., Ltd.

160, Wardour Street, W.,
December 6.

SIR,—Messrs. Novello & Co. assume that our sole informant concerning the conditions under which Mr. Coleridge-Taylor published his works was Sir Charles Stanford. They are wrong. They say that Mr. Coleridge-Taylor was not refused a royalty. The real question is—Did he obtain a royalty? 'The main issue' put forward originally by me was not the one that has been set out by Messrs. Novello & Co. in their letter in The Times of December 7. My desire was, and is, to state that under a fair royalty system such an unfortunate position as we have in Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's case—viz., the need for a pecuniary appeal to the public in behalf of the dead author of a famous and popular work—could not occur often. For the author would have received during his lifetime, and his dependents would be receiving after his death, a due share of the profits earned by his work and genius.—Yours faithfully,

December 7. S. SQUIRE SPRIGGE.

SIR,—A week has passed since Dr. Sprigge asked Messrs. Novello & Co. whether Coleridge-Taylor ultimately received any royalty upon 'Hiawatha.' The chairman of the Society of Authors is naturally concerned with the depreciation of a bad and the exposition of a good principle rather than with special instances. But to the admirers of Coleridge-Taylor and the well-wishers of the distinguished firm whose reputation is now at stake, there remains a more pressing question. Whatever the past arrangement, will Mrs. Coleridge-Taylor now have any substantial share of the annual profits on her husband's successful masterpiece?

It is already apparent that the composer's untimely death will have given an impetus to the sale of his works. Profits will come in year by year not into the wrong pocket but into only one or two right pockets, leaving the other empty and (in this case) needy. When this cannot be rectified it concerns no one. But when a stroke of the gainer's pen can rectify it, no verbal explanations about the sanctity of contracts or the privacy of accounts can do any good. A state of things which continues to pain the disinterested must become unbearable to those directly interested, and those who have known Messrs. Novello & Co. courteously willing to make royalty agreements cannot but believe that they will make such a practical reply as alone can silence their critics and tend to reassure their friends.—I am, Sir, faithfully yours,
December 15. H. WALFORD DAVIES.

[We comment upon this Correspondence on p. 16.—Ed., M.T.]

The exhibitions offered annually by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and Royal College of Music, which entitle their holders to free tuition at the R.A.M. or the R.C.M. for two or three years, have been awarded to the following candidates: Elizabeth Gluckstein, London (piano), Elsie Watson, Huddersfield (singing), and Dorothy M. Davies, Cardiff (harp), at the R.A.M., and Hubert A. M. Marno, Croydon (violin), Hyman Grünbaum, Brighton (violin), and Leonard S. Jefferies, Bristol (piano), at the R.C.M. The exhibitions previously held by Constance K. Newell (London), Lilian M. Gaskell (London), Mary Morgan (Eastbourne), Phyllis Kidner (Brighton), Muriel Wannell (London), Elsie Gregory (London), and Jaroslav K. Bauer (Canada), at the R.A.M., and by Margaret A. M. Stoddart (Jersey), Joyce E. Gale (London), Dorothy E. Bostock (York), Idwen Thomas (Bangor), George F. Ball (Crouch End), and Elsie C. Blundell (London), at the R.C.M., have been renewed for a further period of one year. The exhibition held by Marguerite Torckler (London) at the R.C.M. has also been extended for one term.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The concert given by this Society at the Albert Hall on November 28, was made notable by the inclusion of Elgar's new cantata, 'The Music Makers,' which was brought out at the recent Birmingham Festival, and now presented for the first time in London. In view of the fact that the work of the rehearsals had been somewhat hindered by the preparation for the special Coleridge-Taylor concert given only a few days before, and realising the novelty of many of the choral effects in the cantata, there were some prophecies that the performance might not reach an adequate standard. But it turned out to be quite otherwise. All the broad effects and the finely-built climaxes of the work came out splendidly. Details were missing, but they were not so important as to distract attention from the sweep and fluency of the performance. Sir Frederick Bridge deserves much congratulation on his having got through so difficult a task with so much success. In some respects this was the best performance of the work that had been heard up to date. Miss Muriel Foster was the soloist, and she sang grandly.

The second part of the concert consisted of Elgar's 'Caractacus,' another work by no means easy to make 'go' in the Albert Hall with a large number of performers. The performance, however, was a smooth one, although chorally it was sometimes deficient in attack and vitality. The soloists in this work were Miss Alice Wilna, Mr. Alfred Heather, Mr. Graham Smart, and Mr. Julien Henry. Sir Frederick Bridge again conducted.

THE ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The third concert of the 101st season of this Society, which was held in Queen's Hall on December 5, was made specially notable by three circumstances. First, there was the agreeable announcement in the programme that His Majesty The King had been graciously pleased to give permission for the Society to be known henceforth as The Royal Philharmonic Society; next, Madame Tétrazini sang and was presented with the Society's medal, a rare distinction, which in the course of the existence of the Society has been bestowed only upon twenty-eight musicians—nearly all executants, for it appears that composers rarely come within this dazzling zone of eminence; lastly, the programme included the first performance of a new Symphony by Sir Hubert Parry.

British music was still further represented in an Orchestral fantasy on four Scots tunes, namely, 'Johnnie Cope,' 'When the kye comes hame,' 'Afton water,' and 'Macpherson's Rant'! by Mr. Charles Macpherson. The inclusion of the last tune by this composer conclusively proves that after all a Scotchman can perpetrate a joke and at the same time support his clan. But while there was plenty of freedom and ingenuity, there was no rant in the treatment, and the work has undoubtedly increased the composer's reputation.

The new Symphony made a great impression. It was felt to be a work of deep thought and earnest self-expression. It is in the key of B minor, and is in four linked movements, entitled respectively 'Stress,' 'Love,' 'Play,' and 'Now!' In the account of the work, presumably written by the composer, given in the programme, it is well stated that 'the sphere of music is the expression of feelings, moods, impulses, and emotions; so mere words will not cover what it means.' Suggestions, however, are offered to follow the intentions of the composer in dealing with external ideas. We regret we are compelled to postpone a full consideration of this work. It must suffice just now to give briefly some general impressions. First, we would say that we found the music itself more eloquent than the explanations of its purport. The first movement has great breadth and gravity; the second movement introduces a charming theme delicately treated; the third movement ('Play'), a sort of Scherzo, is one of the most delightful and joyous things the composer has ever written, and the last movement makes a fitting climax and peroration to the whole scheme. The Symphony was conducted by the composer. Welcome items were the admirable performance by Sapellnikoff of Chopin's Pianoforte concerto in E minor, and Madame Tétrazini warbled 'Couplets du Mysoli' (Félicien David), (the flute obbligato to which was perfectly played by Mr. Albert Fransella), 'Solveig's Song' (Grieg), and 'Sérénade du Passant' (Percy Pitt) in her attractive style; Glazounov's Fantaisie Finnoise was also played. Mr. Percy Pitt conducted.

After the concert there was a supper at Paganini's, at which the presentation of the medal was made to Madame Tétrazini by Sir Hubert Parry on behalf of the Society. There was a large attendance, and the note of enjoyment was prominent. Capital speeches were made by Sir Hubert, Mr. A. Kalisch, Dr. Cummings, and others.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Sir Edward Elgar was the conductor on November 25, when César Franck's Symphony, for which he showed special sympathy, was the chief work in the programme. The conductor's 'In the South' Overture opened the concert, and Dvořák's B minor Violoncello concerto was played by Dr. Serge Barjansky.

The Elgar concert given at Queen's Hall on December 9 resolved itself into a personal triumph for the composer, who was present as conductor. The programme consisted of the Symphony in A flat, the Violin concerto, and the 'Enigma' Variations. Sir Edward again showed how his powers of orchestral interpretation excel when applied to his own music. The first movement of the Symphony glowed with exceptional colour, and new meanings seemed constantly to arise. A notably warm interpretation of the concerto was given by Miss Marie Hall. A fine performance of the Variations brought the concert to a worthy close.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

An exceptionally good performance of Beethoven's C minor Symphony was one of the chief attractions at the Symphony Concert given on November 30, and the other was the interpretation of MacDowell's second Pianoforte concerto by Madame Carreffo. Her sympathy with MacDowell's music was expressed not only in the choice of this work but in her compellingly brilliant and expressive playing. The remainder of the programme consisted of Smetana's 'Vltava,' Elgar's 'Cockaigne' Overture, and Glière's Symphonic-poem 'Les Sirènes.' Sir Henry Wood conducted.

THE NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One of the best concerts that have been given by this Orchestra—and this is high praise—took place under Mr. Landon Ronald's direction at Queen's Hall on December 12, when the programme was entirely devoted to Beethoven. The C minor Symphony was interpreted with due nobility and virile expressiveness, and with a distinguished quality of tone. Performances on the same level were given of the 'Coriolanus' and 'Leonora' No. 3 Overtures, and Miss Irene Scharrer gave an attractive reading of the G major Concerto.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The new concert hall of the Academy was 'warmed' on December 12, with a performance of 'Le Nozze di Figaro' by the students, under the direction of Mr. Edgardo Lèvi, with accompaniment supplied on the pianoforte and organ by Miss K. Simpson, Mr. A. Alexander, and Mr. B. J. Dale. The spirit of the performance as a whole and the high level of individual merit shown did great credit to the operatic class of the year and its teaching. The principal parts were taken by Miss Nellie Evans (Countess), Miss Phoebe Cooke (Susanna), Miss Lily Fairney (Cherubino), Mr. Gordon Gates (Count), and Mr. Henry Saunders (Figaro).

The only novelty at the Orchestral Concert given at Queen's Hall on December 13, was by Miss Harriet Cohen, a composer in her teens who has the gift of imagination. Conspicuous ability was shown by Miss Evelyn Dorothy Vincent (pianist) and Master Willie Davies (violinist).

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A chamber concert was given at the Royal College of Music on December 4, with César Franck's Pianoforte quintet and Beethoven's C minor String quartet as the principal works.

The orchestral concert took place on December 13, under the direction of Sir Charles Stanford, who conducted an excellent performance of Mozart's 'Prague' Symphony in D. Mr. Alan Taffs, the new Mendelssohn Scholar, played Liszt's E flat Pianoforte concerto, and the programme included Dr. Vaughan Williams's Suite 'The Wasps.'

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

The list of British composers who are indebted to Mr. Arthur Fagge and the London Choral Society for the first performances of their works now includes the name of Hugh R. Hulbert. His setting of Milton's 'Lycidas' for soli, eight-part chorus, and orchestra, was produced by the Society at Queen's Hall on December 4, under Mr. Fagge's direction. It was perhaps an over-bold idea on the part of an inexperienced composer to set Milton to music, for in place of the intimacy of expression demanded, Mr. Hulbert came equipped with little beyond a surface picturesqueness of style. His manner varied from the grandiloquent to the sentimental, and his musical language was highly coloured, imaginative, and crowded with interesting touches, but its inappropriateness to the text was a frequent bar to enjoyment. The Society then performed Mr. Arnold Bax's 'Enchanted Summer,' a setting of Shelley, in which the composer makes a real struggle to express himself consistently with the poet's elevated thought. Mr. Percy Grainger's 'Irish Air' and 'Father and Daughter' followed, the latter being encored as readily as at its first production, and the programme concluded with Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan,' in circumstances which drew particular effect from its perfect appropriateness of idiom. The various solo parts of the concert were taken by Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Leah Felissa, Miss Gladys Roberts, Miss Goldsbrough, Mr. Hughes Macklin, and Mr. Thorpe Bates.

RAILWAY MUSICAL SOCIETIES.

An excellent musical enterprise and a good work of charity were carried out under the prompting and directing of Mr. W. Johnson Galloway at the Albert Hall on November 23, when the Great Eastern and other railway musical Societies co-operated in a concert for the benefit of the Railwaymen's Convalescent Home. The combined Societies provided a choir of 250 male voices and an orchestra of 200, and the programme included Mendelssohn's 'To the sons of art,' some unaccompanied part-songs, the second and third movements from Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony, and other orchestral numbers. Popular solo-numbers were given by Miss Ruth Vincent, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Robert Curtis.

The Stock Exchange Choral and Orchestral Society, who had appointed Mr. Coleridge-Taylor as conductor not long before his death, signaled their devotion to his memory at Queen's Hall on December 6 by performances of Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture, the late composer's Violin concerto, and other works, and Mendelssohn's Motet 'Beati Mortui.' The violin soloist was Mr. Arthur Catterall, and Mr. Julien Henry gave vocal numbers. The conductor was Mr. W. H. Reed.

Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture was well played by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Payne, at Queen's Hall on December 11, when a smoking concert was given. Mr. Percy Grainger conducted his 'Mock Morris,' and solos were given by Miss L. Evans-Williams (vocalist) and Miss Annie Godfrey (violinist).

The Strolling Players gave a 'Ladies' Night' Concert at Queen's Hall on December 13, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Ivimey. Hamilton Harty's 'With the wild geese' and Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance' were well played and well received, and excellent contributions were made by Miss Margery Bentwich (violinist) and Mr. Robert Maitland (vocalist).

BANK MUSICAL SOCIETIES.

A large audience attended the 'Bohemian' concert of the London and South Western Bank Orchestral Society at Cannon Street Hotel on November 28. This body is still in its first year; yet highly creditable performances were given of the 'Meistersinger' Overture, the 'Peer-Gynt' Suite, and other works under the direction of Mr. Herbert J. Rouse.

A very agreeable concert was given on December 4 at Caxton Hall by Barclay's Bank Musical Society, which consists of a well-equipped male-voice choir. Mr. J. W. Lewis, the conductor, is a past-master in the art of selecting interesting programmes, and on this occasion he was unusually successful in pleasing the taste of the large and influential audience gathered. A selection from Berlioz's 'Faust,' 'Viking song' (Julius Harrison), 'Hymn to harmony' (Laurent de Rillé), a very effective chorus, Stanford's 'Songs of the Fleet,' and 'The sailor's return' (Percy Fletcher) were among the chief items. A young violinist, Mr. Fery Weltmann, showed highly promising technical skill. A small professional orchestra, led by Mr. P. Lewis, accompanied and played selections. The vocal soloists were Miss Gladys Elliot, Mr. Henry Turnpenney, Mr. Stuart Edward, and Mr. Leonard Rogers, and Mr. W. A. Searle and the conductor accompanied.

Miss Gwynne Kimpton's series of Orchestral Concerts for the young, given this season at Æolian Hall, was carried to a further stage on November 24, when the chief work in the programme was Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony. Mr. Stewart Macpherson prepared the way for its appreciation, and solo contributions by Miss Gwladys Roberts (vocalist) and Miss May Burgess (violinist) added further interest. Dr. G. Henschel's singing gave extra distinction to the concert of December 14.

The high capabilities of the Royal Engineers' String Band were shown at Queen's Hall on November 27, when Beethoven's 'Leonora' Overture No. 3, and Brahms's second Symphony were finely played under the direction of Mr. Neville Flux.

Schumann's 'Manfred' was the chief work given by the Orpheus Choral and Orchestral Society at the Hampstead Conservatoire on December 13. The musical portions were creditably performed under the direction of Mr. Claud Powell, and Mr. Charles Fry's admirable reciting added further interest and distinction to the occasion. Bach's cantata, 'The sages of Sheba,' and Christmas songs, given by Mrs. Harry Bedford, were also in the programme.

The Students' Orchestral Concert of the Guildhall School of Music, given at Queen's Hall under Mr. Landon Ronald's direction on December 16, once more demonstrated the rapid advance of this department of the work of the School. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony was the chief work in the programme. Miss Lillian Stiles Allen sang, Mr. Eric Zardo played the 'Emperor' Pianoforte concerto, and a students' choir assisted.

A further Students' Concert to be placed on record is that of Trinity College of Music, given at Queen's Hall on December 17. An Overture by Mr. Edward S. Mitchell and good pianoforte playing by Master Richard Ball Johnston were the chief features. Mr. Wilhelm Sachse conducted.

A programme of considerable historical and musical interest was carried out with exemplary efficiency by the Oriana Madrigal Society at Westminster Cathedral Hall on December 17, under the direction of Mr. C. Kennedy Scott, Orlando Gibbons's 'Hosanna to the Son of David,' Palestrina's 'Ave Maria,' and part of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' were included.

It was ambitious on the part of Mr. A. J. Slocombe (violinist), the South Hampstead Orchestra, and its conductor, Mrs. Julian Marshall, to give a performance of Elgar's Violin concerto, but the ambition was more than justified by the result. The concert took place on December 17 at the new hall of the Royal Academy of Music.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Madame Donalds's recital at Queen's Hall, on November 20, enlarged her reputation as an able vocalist and gained in interest from the assistance of the New Symphony Orchestra, who played Elgar's 'Enigma Variations,' Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' and the 'Meistersinger' Overture, under Mr. Landon Ronald.

On November 25, at Æolian Hall, Miss Carmen Hill showed that her progress has brought her notable ability as a Lieder singer.

Recitals were given on November 19 by Miss Doris Montrave (Bechstein Hall) and Mlle. Antonia Dolores (Bechstein Hall); on November 20 by Miss Rosie Whur (Steinway Hall); on November 22 by Mr. Leonard Sickert, assisted by Miss Gladys Elliott (Bechstein Hall), and the pupils of Mr. R. J. Pitcher (Bechstein Hall); on November 26 by Mr. Oscar Seagle (Æolian Hall); on November 27 by Mlle. Lucia Cosma (Bechstein Hall), and Miss Gladys Palmer, assisted by Miss Florence von Etlinger's ladies' choir (Steinway Hall); on November 28 by Mlle. Antonia Dolores (Bechstein Hall) and by Mr. Robert Maitland (Bechstein Hall); on November 29 by Miss Gilderoy Scott (Steinway Hall); on December 2 by Miss Elliott Seabrooke and Miss Aline Trewhman (Æolian Hall); on December 3 by Miss Gladys Moger (Æolian Hall), and Miss Alice Mandeville (Bechstein Hall); on December 4 by Miss Elsie Harcourt (Steinway Hall), and by Miss Dolores (Bechstein Hall); on December 7 by Miss Eva Rosenbusch (Æolian Hall); on December 16 by Miss Hilda Cooke (Steinway Hall), and by Mr. Hubert Curling (Bechstein Hall); on December 17 by Miss Ella Caspers (Æolian Hall).

Miss Muriel Foster gave a further recital at Bechstein Hall on November 26, and repeated her programme of November 18, before an audience that occupied every seat.

Miss Mary Leighton showed considerable vocal resource in the course of her recital at Bechstein Hall on November 26.

Miss Elena Gerhardt gave two recitals of her incomparable Lieder-singing at Queen's Hall on December 2 and 20, preparatory to sailing for America.

Mr. Plunket Greene showed at Æolian Hall, on December 3, that he can practise what he preaches. His lectures and book on 'Interpretation in song' have propounded an ideal, and he himself leads the way in a practical approach to it.

Miss Lily Crawford sang only English songs and songs in English at Bechstein Hall on December 10. On December 12, at Æolian Hall, Miss Dilya Jones made one regret that she so rarely gives recitals; in Mr. Plunket Greene's absence through illness, assistance was given by Mr. Owen Collyer.

The 'farewell' concert of Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford took place before an immense audience at the Albert Hall, on December 15. Both artists were in excellent voice.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Recitals were given on November 19 by Mr. John Powell (Æolian Hall) and Herr Fritz Scavinius (Queen's Hall); on November 20 by Madame Alma Haas (Steinway Hall) and Misses Barbara Howarth and Adela Hamaton, in music for two pianofortes (Æolian Hall); on November 21 by Miss Adèle de Haas (Marble Arch House); on November 25 by Mr. Arthur Newstead, who played only Schumann's music (Steinway Hall); on November 29 by M. Cernikoff (Æolian Hall); on December 4 by Miss Doru Bernich, a newcomer (Æolian Hall); on December 9 by Miss Muriel Little (Steinway Hall); on December 10 by Miss Florence Thomas (Broadwood Rooms); on December 13 by Mr. F. S. Kelly (Æolian Hall).

Miss Rose Koenig has added to her Wagnerian repertory a selection illustrating the first act of 'Die Walküre,' and on November 19 she played it among other Wagner transcriptions before a delighted audience at Leighton House.

Herr Backhaus was again a perfect executant at Queen's Hall on November 26, when he played only Beethoven and Chopin. Mr. Frederic Lamond's eminence as a Beethoven player was again demonstrated at Queen's Hall on December 4. Madame Carreño was as great as ever throughout her recital at Queen's Hall on December 14. Miss Constance Keeping gave an historical programme at Steinway Hall on December 17.

Music for two pianofortes was played by Misses Barbara Howarth and Adela Hamaton at Æolian Hall on November 21, and by Miss Maude Dixon and Miss Clara Clark at Steinway Hall on December 2.

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

Miss Phyllis Norman Parker made a good impression as a violinist at Æolian Hall on November 22, and also as a composer. Her 'Five Fancies' for the pianoforte were played by Miss Evelyn Dawkin.

The Thursday Twelve o'Clock Concerts at Æolian Hall have brought many excellent artists, including Miss Lena Kontorotie (violinist), on November 21; Miss Phyllis Howse (contralto), on November 28; the Misses Verne in duets for two pianofortes on December 5; 'Solomon,' the boy pianist, and M. Fastovsky, a Russian tenor, on December 12.

Mention must be made of the recitals given by Signor Luigi Gasparini (violinocello) and Miss Evelyn Ingleton (pianoforte) at Broadwood Rooms on November 21; by the Misses May and Irene Ward-Meyer (violinist and pianist) at Æolian Hall on November 27; by the sisters Von Arányi at Æolian Hall on November 28; by Signor Mario Lorenzi (harapist) at Broadwood Rooms and by Miss Violet Clark (violinist) at Steinway Hall on December 4; by Miss Gwendoline Church (violinist) at Steinway Hall on December 10; by Miss Ilse Veda Duttlinger (violinist) at Bechstein Hall on December 13; by M. Emilio Pujol (guitar) at Bechstein Hall on December 14; by Mr. B. Huberman (violinist) at Queen's Hall on December 16.

M. Sapellnikoff (pianist) and Mr. Theodore Byard (vocalist) both possess and deserve European reputations, and it was gratifying to see a large audience at Æolian Hall, on November 26, when they gave a joint recital of the highest interest. A second recital, on December 10, was similarly successful. A highly agreeable recital was given at Æolian Hall, on December 5, by Madame Féroux-Williams (vocalist), and Miss Elena de Olloqui (pianist).

The Klingler Quartet were again heard on the occasion of the Classical Society's concert at Bechstein Hall, on November 27. Further concerts of this series have brought forward Misses Mathilde and Adela Verne (December 4), Mr. Leonard Borwick and Fraulein Meta Diestel (December 11).

A concert was given at Bechstein Hall on November 29 by the vocal and pianoforte pupils of Miss Lily West and Madame Edith Hands.

Beethoven's Trio, Op. 70, No. 1, formed part of the programme given at Æolian Hall on December 5 by the Albion Trio, whose members are Miss Louise Aumonier, Miss Dorothea Walenn, and Miss Phyllis Hasluck. These players have lately been securing good opinion in Denmark and Germany.

Mlle. Hélène Luquiens, a singer of rare distinction, was the principal artist concerned in the concert given at 'The Limes,' Holland Park Gardens, on December 6, by the Société des Concerts Français. The programme contained works by Guy Ropartz, Philippe Gaubert, Déodat de Séverac, and Vincent d'Indy; and the instrumental part was carried out by Mlle. A. Velard (pianoforte), Mr. Revel (violinocello), and M. Michelin (clarinet).

A varied programme of music by Count Wachtmeister was given at Æolian Hall on December 6.

The programme in which the Sevcik Quartet elected to be heard at Bechstein Hall on December 10, consisted of Dvorák's Quartet in F major, Op. 96, César Franck's Pianoforte quintet, and Schubert's D minor Quartet. The pianist was Mr. Max Darewski, who bore the responsibility of his position well.

An interesting concert was given at Queen's (Small) Hall on December 10 by Mr. Albert Fransella, the flautist, who was joined by Miss Marjorie Hayward (violinist) and Miss Winifred Christie (pianist) in the performance of two Sonatas by Bach and one by Purcell. The three artists, forming the 'New Instrumental Trio,' played skilfully and in good ensemble. Songs were given by Miss Margaret Warde and by Mr. Edward Ramsay, who sang two by Madame Poldowski.

A Violin sonata in F sharp minor by Julius Röntgen and pianoforte pieces by G. H. G. von Brücken Fock added interest to the programme carried out by Miss Jetty Ingenius (pianist) and Mr. Hans Neumann (violinist) on December 11.

Schumann's Trio in F (Op. 80), and Beethoven's in B flat were admirably played by the London Trio at Æolian Hall on December 16. The soloists of the occasion were Miss Daker-Fletcher (vocalist) and Mr. Louis Pécskai (violinist).

Attractive examples of the teaching of Miss Florence von Etlinger's School of Opéra-Comique were given at the School on December 16 in the shape of performances of 'The Cicada' and a 'Christmas scene.'

Suburban Concerts.

On November 23, the Central Croydon Choral Society gave a Memorial Concert to the late Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor, the programme consisting of his 'Death of Minnehaha,' Violin concerto, and 'A tale of Old Japan.' Miss Esta D'Argo, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Julien Henry, the choir, and the orchestra—all seemed inspired by the occasion, and this made the concert memorable for the excellence of the performances. For his playing of the Violin concerto, Mr. William J. Read received a prolonged ovation. The orchestra accompanied well under Mr. Roland Richards. The Society announces 'The Dream of Gerontius' for the next occasion.

A successful ballad concert, with Miss Alice Esty, Miss Leah Felissa, Miss Dora Thorpe, Miss Violet Oppenshaw, Mr. Philip Ritte, Mr. H. Lane Wilson (vocalists), and Miss Marie Novello (pianist) as the principal artists, was given at the Highbury Athenæum on November 26, by Messrs. J. B. Cramer.

The Lavender Hill Choral Society and String Band, conducted by Mr. George Lane, gave a concert at Battersea Town Hall on November 28, in aid of the Benevolent and Orphan Fund of the National Union of Teachers. Cowen's 'John Gilpin' was the chief number in the programme, which included a contribution of violin solos by Mr. Frank Lane.

The Ealing Philharmonic Society gave their fifty-first concert at the Town Hall, Ealing, on November 30, when a deeply-impressive performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was given before a huge audience which filled every corner of the building. The choir particularly distinguished themselves by vivid and expressive singing throughout the work, and later in the evening performed with much acceptance the test-pieces sung at the recent Paris Musical Festival, at which they gained a second-prize. The soloists, Miss Christine Bywater, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Dawson Freer, gave complete satisfaction. Mr. Victor Williams conducted with his usual ability.

The South-West Choral Society, at Battersea Town Hall on December 4, gave excellent performances of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' Parts 1 and 2, and Bridge's 'The Flag of England,' under the direction of Mr. Arthur R. Saunders, before a large and enthusiastic audience. A special feature of the concert was the excellent singing of the choir, who had thoroughly caught the spirit of the music performed. The soloists were Miss Maud Wilby, whose singing was of exceptional merit, and Messrs. William Kingwell and Foster Richardson. The accompaniments were well played by a full orchestra led by Miss Kathleen Sherring.

The forty-fifth season of the South London Choral Association opened on December 4 with a concert at the South London Institute of Music, under the direction of Mr. L. C. Venables. The programme contained Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-bon Suite,' which was well performed by the choir and the efficient accompanying orchestra. The baritone soloist was Mr. Eric Davidson. Percy Fletcher's 'The Deacon's Masterpiece' and Bridge's 'The Flag of England,' in which the soprano soloist was Miss Mary Leighton, added further interest to the programme, which in spite of its exacting nature was carried out with uniformly good results.

A very successful concert in aid of the choir fund of St. Augustine's Church, Honor Oak Park, was given on December 5 by the Honor Oak Glee Singers. Although the Society, conducted by the organist of the church, Mr. Henry F. Hall, is quite in its infancy, its singing was marked by intelligence, good balance of tone, and delicacy of expression. Miss Maud Wilby and Mr. Allen Engles contributed songs and duets.

A hundred chamber concerts have been given at All Saints' Church Hall, Woodford Green, by Dr. E. Markham Lee. At the hundredth, which took place on December 6, Dr. Lee was presented with a grandfather clock and a cheque for £20.

'A tale of Old Japan' and 'Acis and Galatea' were given by the St. Peter's Choral Society at Brockley on Tuesday, December 10. The soloists were Miss Clytie Hine, Miss Alice Booth, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. Dr. C. J. Frost conducted. The accompaniments were played by a small string band, and Mr. E. F. Barker was at the pianoforte and Mr. Alfred J. Sindall at the harmonium. The performance of the works was highly successful, and the concert was well supported. This was the first concert of the Society's twenty-eighth season.

The enterprise of the Streatham Hill Choral Society reached its highest point on December 10 with a performance of Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius' that left little, if anything, wanting from complete expressiveness. The choir and orchestra did their work efficiently, and preserved a good balance. The solo parts were taken by Mr. Gerald Harris (Gerontius), Mr. Charles Mott (The Priest and the Angel of the Agony), and Miss Ella Caspers (the Angel), who also sang Cowen's 'He giveth His beloved sleep.' Congratulations are due to the conductor, Mr. E. J. Quance, for the success of the occasion.

An excellent start of the season was made on December 10 by the Teddington Philharmonic Society with a performance of 'A tale of Old Japan,' under the direction of Mr. William Ratcliffe. The singing of the choir and that of the soloists—Miss Florence Mellors, Miss Grace Haywood, Mr. Thorold Waters, and Mr. George Baker—were on an equally attractive level. Bantock's 'The Cruiskeen Lawn' was among the miscellaneous numbers.

The Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society, with its choir of 150 and orchestra of sixty, gave the first concert of the sixth season, on December 11, at Chiswick Town Hall. The principal feature of the evening was Coleridge-Taylor's setting of Alfred Noyes's poem 'A tale of Old Japan,' for soli, chorus, and orchestra. Mr. David M. Davis, the Society's able conductor, secured a most satisfactory performance. The singing throughout was marked by very careful attention to the spirit of the music and the observance of light and shade. 'Lying on the golden sand' afforded opportunity for delicate vocal treatment, and the 'Peonies' choruses were given with fine effect. The choir's principal achievement was, however, with the series of choruses commencing 'So when the rich young merchant.' The solo vocalists were Misses Clytie Hine and Alice Booth, Messrs. George Brierley and Greaves Johnson. Mr. David M. Davis's experienced conducting was marked throughout by clearness and decision. In the miscellaneous second part of the programme Miss Winifred Bromidge played Chopin's Polonaise in E flat for pianoforte, with orchestra.

Mr. Percy Grainger was the shining light at the concert given by the Hainault Glee and Madrigal Choir on December 12. His choral arrangements of the 'Londonderry Air' and 'I'm seventeen come Sunday' were sung, and Mr. Grainger himself supplied pianoforte solos. Other choral numbers in the programme were Festa's 'Down in a flow'ry vale,' Pilkington's 'The messenger of the delightful Spring,' Mr. E. L. Bainton's arrangement of 'The Winter it is past,' and Mr. Edward Norman Hay's madrigal 'The afterglow.' The solo vocalists were Miss Ada Tunks, Mr. Charles H. Sinden, and Mr. Harry Child. Mr. John Cook conducted.

Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and Hubert Bath's 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' constituted an excellent light programme for the choral concert given by the Bromley Choral Society, under the capable direction of Mr. Frederic Fertel, on December 12. The choral singing was marked by enthusiasm and consequent expressiveness, and good work was done by the soloists, Miss Rosina Buckmann, Miss Maude Clough, Mr. Gwylim Richards, and Mr. Montague Borwell. An orchestra gave excellent assistance.

'The Messiah' was creditably performed by the Dulwich Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Julius Harrison, at the Crystal Palace on December 14. The spirited interpretation of the choruses, and the readiness with which the choral singers responded, gave special interest to the occasion. The solo quartet consisted of Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Marion Battishill, Mr. George Brierley, and Mr. George Baker.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BELFAST.

On November 29 the second concert of the season was given by the Philharmonic Society. The principal works for choir and orchestra were Dvorák's Te Deum in G and Hamish MacCunn's 'Lord Ullin's Daughter.' The solo parts in both were sung by Miss Alice Westmoreland (a most refined and cultivated singer whose voice, however, was scarcely powerful enough for the Ulster Hall) and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The rest of the very interesting concert included two parts of Granville Bantock's Serenade for string orchestra, 'In the Far West'; the Introduction to Act 3 of Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde' (with the cor anglais solo exquisitely played by Mr. Stephen Whittaker); Mackenzie's nautical Overture, 'Britannia'; Percy Grainger's Irish reel, 'Molly on the shore'; and Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance.' The solo singers filled up the programme with songs. There was very general appreciation of the great progress in the work of the choir and orchestra under the Society's new conductor, Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, and a feeling that under his skilful baton the Society has before it a most promising future.

BIRMINGHAM.

The principal topic in local musical circles was undoubtedly the recent visit of the Quinlan Opera Company, the most successful operatic season ever held in Birmingham. An account of the operas produced has already appeared in last month's issue of the Musical Times in connection with 'Music in the Provinces.' On the last night, November 30, Mr. Quinlan announced that he and his company will pay another visit to the Theatre Royal in the spring, when they will produce the complete cycle of Wagner's 'Ring,' also 'Die Meistersinger,' an announcement which was received with great enthusiasm. It was a pity that the Carl Rosa Opera Company immediately followed the Quinlan organization; their week's stay here, at the Prince of Wales Theatre, resulted in a considerable financial loss, although their performances were on a high level of artistic merit. The revival of Boito's 'Mefistofele' contrary to expectation drew a very poor house, but those present were most enthusiastic in their appreciation of this interesting presentation.

The Birmingham Philharmonic Society gave their second of four orchestral concerts in the Town Hall on December 4, under Mr. Thomas Beecham's conductorship. The programme consisted of only four items: Balakirev's Symphonic-poem, 'Thamar,' César Franck's Symphony in D minor, Mozart's Violin concerto in E flat, accompanied by the orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic-suite 'Sheherazade.' The conductor, as everyone knows, is much in sympathy with Russian music, and in its handling he imparts to it vitality and a certain degree of Slavonic spirit which helped to bring out the glamour of these tone-pictures; but they did not specially appeal to the audience. Quite a different effect was produced by the fine performance of César Franck's beautiful Symphony. The solo violinist was Mr. William Henley.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society's second concert of the current season was given in the Town Hall on December 5, under Dr. Sinclair's careful and attentive conductorship. There was plenty of variety in the programme submitted, and one was specially interested in the second hearing here of Dr. Walford Davies's recent Festival work, 'Song of St. Francis,' one of the composer's happiest inspirations, for in its structure he shows wealth of colouring and variety of expressive moods that admirably fit the text. The performance was especially notable for tone power, and considering the complex and difficult nature of the part-writing, some startling effect was secured, but there were also episodes that sounded confused and wanting in attack, often resulting in a confused mass of sound. The principals were Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Morgan Kingston, and Mr. Watkin Mills. The novelty of the evening was a short cantata by Mr. Arthur Cooke, entitled 'The fountain of tears,' poem by Arthur O'Shaughnessy, set to music for chorus, orchestra, and soprano solo, the soloist being Miss Laura Evans-Williams. Under the composer's baton the performance was on the whole quite excellent, the work creating a good impression, Mr. Cooke at the close being most enthusiastically applauded. As a first essay on a larger scale, although short in duration, the composer showed considerable inventive talent in orchestral colouring, and in his part-writing he produces good effect by simple means, entirely discarding complex and abstruse devices. The programme also contained Sir Hubert Parry's 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin,' which has only once been heard here previously, having been given by the Choral Union in 1906, under Mr. Thomas Facer's conductorship. Mr. C. W. Perkins's help at the organ was of great value.

The Birmingham and Midland Scottish Society held their annual concert in the Town Hall on November 30, the programme being supplied by the London Scottish Choir, whose excellent part-singing created quite a furore.

The Birmingham Symphony Orchestra gave a popular orchestral concert in the Town Hall on December 7, the conductor again being Mr. Julian Clifford, of the Harrogate Kursaal Concerts. The Orchestra is now in thorough sympathy with its conductor, and rarely played better. The Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford was the vocalist, and sang very charmingly, her efforts being enthusiastically received. The re-appearance of Mr. John Dunn, the celebrated English violinist, after an absence of about ten years, gave to the concert a distinct cachet of its own. He gave a magnificent performance of the Tchaikovsky Concerto, his executive skill being quite phenomenal. The Catterall Quartet gave a chamber concert at Queen's College on December 10, with complete artistic results.

Mr. Max Mossel's second Drawing Room Concert of a series of four was given in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, December 12, an excellent programme of music being provided by Siegmund Feuermann, the remarkable boy violinist of Vienna, Herr Egno Petri, pianist, now of Berlin, and Miss Elizabeth Munthe-Kass, the delightful Norwegian Lieder singer. The accompanist was Mr. G. H. Manton. A concert was also given the same evening in the large Lecture Hall of the Midland Institute by the Birmingham Madrigal Society, now trained and conducted by Mr. T. Appleby Matthews. The glees and madrigals were well sung, and showed excellent teaching. Songs were contributed by members of the choir, and Mr. Arthur Hytch played some violin solos. The Birmingham Choral Union, under Mr. Richard Wassell's able conductorship, gave an interesting concert recital of Gounod's 'Faust' in the Town Hall, on December 14, the principal artists being Miss Kate Anderson, Madame Eunice Fowles, Mr. Wilson Pembroke, Mr. W. O. Busby, and Mr. Frank Macnamara. Solo harp, Mr. Charles Collier, organist, Mr. C. W. Perkins.

Colston Hall was crowded on December 14, when Bristol Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. George Riseley, gave an admirable performance of 'The Messiah.' The choir numbered 450 voices, and there was an orchestra of 100 players, with Mr. Harold Bernard leader. The soloists were Madame Mary Conly, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Frank Webster, and Mr. Robert Radford.

On December 17 the Christmas Concert was given at Colston School. The chief interest was displayed in Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' which then received its first performance in Bristol. The soprano and alto solo parts were taken by boys of the school choir (L. B. Phillips and H. A. Higgs respectively), and the tenor and bass solos by Mr. C. E. Golding and Mr. H. Spiller. Mr. Harold Bernard led the band, and Mr. W. S. Calway conducted.

BOURNEMOUTH.

Concerts at the Winter Gardens continue to be very numerous, and upon the whole it seems that, in contradistinction to reports that emanate from other centres, the season here may be considered moderately successful as a paying proposition. It is, of course, the artists of name and fame who draw the biggest houses; at the same time the Symphony Concerts seem capable of holding their own, and the Monday 'Pops' have even increased the favour with which orchestral music is regarded in this town.

The programmes of the Symphony Concerts during the past month have been distinguished for their abundant interest, and the performances have been consistently good, an exceptionally spirited interpretation, in particular, of Tchaikovsky's F minor Symphony betokening a development of grip and finish in its accomplishment that speaks well for the future. Other works in this class to which full justice was done by Mr. Dan Godfrey and his instrumentalists were Beethoven's seventh Symphony, César Franck's one and only essay in this form, and Schubert's great C major Symphony. Among some telling compositions of various designs, Elgar's 'Cockaigne' Overture, Ravel's 'Pavane for a dead Infanta,' Goldmark's 'In Italien' Overture, and Dvořák's 'Husitska' Overture must be noted. Some very capable soloists have been forthcoming in the persons of Miss Lena Kontorowitsch, Mr. Claud Biggs (at one time a resident in Bournemouth), Mr. Philip Abbas, and Mr. Vernon Warner, these artists being responsible, successively, for performances of Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor, Brahms's Pianoforte concerto in B flat, Dvořák's 'Cello concerto, and César Franck's Symphonic Variations for pianoforte and orchestra.

The last four Monday 'Pops.' have consisted of compositions drawn from the works of a quartet of musical giants—Brahms, Schubert, Beethoven, and Wagner.

With regard to recitals and miscellaneous concerts, there has been a regular influx of world-famous artists. On November 16, Paderewski once again established his claim to the title of 'the wizard of the pianoforte,' and a week afterwards the platform was occupied by Madame Melba. A third performer of assured popularity was Madame Carreño.

The combined forces of the Municipal Choir and Orchestra gave their first concert of the season on November 19, the work chosen for performance being Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' which received an effective interpretation, the singing of the choir showing a marked improvement over that of last season, and the orchestra playing with a steadiness and conviction that ensured success. Mr. Dan Godfrey again revealed his genuine ability as an interpreter of choral music. The soloists were Miss Doris Carter, Miss Winifred Lewis, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow, of whom Mr. Mullings was the most skilful.

BRISTOL AND DISTRICT.

There was a large attendance at the Victoria Rooms on November 30, when the Bristol Musical Society gave a concert. The works chosen were Barnett's 'Ancient Mariner,' and Sir Hubert Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' with a miscellaneous selection. The effect of Sir Hubert Parry's work was heightened by the employment of boys from Bristol Grammar School, trained by Mr. C. W. Stear, who directed the concert with ability. The soloists were Miss Gertrude Reynolds, Miss Gwladys Curling, Mr. Frank Slater, and Mr. Bernard Knowles. Mr. F. S. Gardner led the orchestra, and Mr. Hubert W. Hunt was at the organ. Miss Ruby Taylor, a youthful player, displayed her proficiency in the first Pianoforte concerto of Mendelssohn, with the orchestra.

The quartet concerts arranged by Mr. H. W. Hunt are appreciated by the residents of Clifton, and on December 2 the sixth of the series was given at the Victoria Rooms. The following were the players: Mr. Hunt and Miss K. Tudor Pole (violins), Miss Gladys Home (viola), and Mr. Roger Bucknall (violinello). Mozart's Quartets in D minor and C major, and the Quartet in A minor of Brahms were excellently played.

On December 9 the Clifton Quintet appeared at the Victoria Rooms and gratified a large audience. There were fine interpretations of César Franck's Quintet in F minor and Mozart's Quartet in E flat.

At the Shirehampton Parish Hall on December 11 the Avonmouth Choral Society gave their first concert of the season. Mr. Clive Carey and Miss Beatrice Dunne sang folk-songs, and the choir under the direction of Mr. W. Powell were heard in part-songs. The president (Mr. P. Napier Miles) had composed the 'Ode to Maia,' words by Keats, dedicated to the conductor and members of the Society. This was well performed and much applauded.

On December 11 Bristol New Philharmonic Society gave the first concert of their twelfth season under the direction of Mr. Arnold Barter, and gratified a large audience at the Victoria Rooms. After Coleridge-Taylor's Ballade in A minor had been played with animation, Elgar's 'The Music Makers' was performed in a highly creditable manner, the contralto soloist being Miss Phyllis Lett. The audience evinced their gratification at the work and its interpretation by hearty applause. Miss Lett sang with great charm Elgar's 'Sea Pictures,' and afterwards Cowen's 'John Gilpin' was sung by the choir with appropriate humour. The programme also included 'Le Rouet d'Omphale' (Saint-Saëns), effectively played by the orchestra, of which Mr. Harold Bernard was the leader.

The Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society, on December 5, gave their first concert for the season at Knightstone Pavilion, and gratified by a highly creditable performance of 'Elijah.' The chief soloists were Miss Lilian Dillingham, Miss Gertrude Winchester, Mr. Joseph Cheetham, and Mr. William Batey. Mr. Edward Cook conducted carefully.

On December 10, Clevedon Philharmonic Society performed 'Elijah' at the Public Hall in the presence of a large assembly. The soloists were Miss Amy Richards, Miss Violet Love, Mr. David Appleyard (Wells Cathedral), and Mr. Lionel Doré. Mr. E. Cook conducted.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Mendelssohn's 'Come, let us sing' formed the chief part of a concert given by St. Matthias (Plymouth) Choir on November 20. An orchestra assisted, and Mr. E. L. Goodall conducted. Anthems were also sung. The Plymouth Guildhall Choir sang the 'Hiawatha' trilogy at two performances on November 23, with considerable success, judicious cuts being made to bring the three parts within the scope of a continuous performance. Mr. H. Moreton conducted, and generally the choral singing was excellent, and on occasion very beautiful, though there were signs of inattention and weak entries. The principals were Miss Maud Wilby, Mr. Frank Webster, Mr. David Brazell, and Mr. Maurice Alexander (orchestra). St. Simon's (Plymouth) Choir, conducted by Mr. W. G. Nelder, contributed part-songs (by Pinsuti and Balfe) and folk-songs at a miscellaneous concert on November 27. On December 11 three Nonconformist church choirs were musically occupied. Haydn's 'The Creation' was sung at Princes Street (Devonport) Congregational Church by a choir and band numbering eighty, conducted by Mr. E. L. Lane; the cantata, 'The captive maid of Israel,' was enjoyed by a large audience in Morice Square (Devonport) Baptist Church, the choir singing well under the direction of Mr. S. J. Weeks at the organ; and St. Levan (Devonport) Sunday School Choir sang the cantata 'An hour in Fairyland,' and choruses.

The cultivation of orchestral and chamber music is at a deplorably low ebb in the Three Towns. In the former department there are only two series of concerts running, and in the latter—instrumental ensemble—there is no regular enterprise current. More honour thus devolves upon those who do make effort to develop the highest forms of the art, but one could wish the honour had to be divided among a greater number. At Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society's thirteenth Symphony Concert, on November 27, the Schumann Op. 120 in D minor was performed. With Miss Janie Crews as soloist, the second Saint-Saëns Concerto, G minor, Op. 22, for pianoforte and orchestra received artistic interpretation, and a Rhapsody by Mr. Walter Weekes was included. Dr. Weekes and Mr. Walter Weekes conducted in turn.

The third concert of the nineteenth season of Mr. J. W. Newton's Symphony Concerts at Stonehouse, on December 6, was chiefly memorable for an interesting and musically performance by Mr. C. G. Pike of the solo part of the Concerto by Saint-Saëns for violinello and orchestra. The band caught the spirit of the music, with the happiest effect. The Symphony was Schumann's No. 3, and a Suite for orchestra by Moszkowski, 'Aus aller Herren Länder,' was played. At a pianoforte recital on November 21, Miss Edith Tapson displayed brilliant technique and artistic perception.

For the second of their series of Musical Matinées the Misses Smith secured a visit from Mr. Plunket Greene, who exhibited his skill as an interpreter in a long and varied list of folk-songs and ballads; and the Misses Smith and Mrs. Freeman played the Tchaikovsky Trio for pianoforte, violin, and 'cello.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

Mr. Allan Allen obtained from the Exeter Choral Society (with band), on November 28, a performance of 'Scenes from the Bavarian Highlands' which showed that progress is manifestly being made by this energetic class. Kingsbridge and District Choral Society, which was resuscitated last year, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Harris, on December 5 performed 'Elijah' with a success which justified their ambitious effort. The choir, consisting of eighty singers, made special effect in the 'Baal' numbers, and sang the bravura numbers with vigour and precision. Part-songs were beautifully sung by the Barnstaple Musical Festival Society on December 9, under Dr. H. J. Edwards, this being a department of choral art in which they excel. The chief pieces were Buck's 'Hymn to Music' and Max Bruch's 'Morning song of praise,' others being by Macfarren (senior and junior), Mendelssohn, and Fanning. Dr. Edwards collaborated with Miss Violet Shapcott and Mr. C. G. Pike in Mendelssohn's Trio, Op. 66, and Sonatas for the solo string instruments were by Schutt, Grieg, and Dvorák. St. Luke's College Choir, at Exeter, on December 10, conducted by Mr. A. R. Trevithick, sang Grieg's cantata, 'Recognition of land,' the seventy male voices producing fine and beautiful effects. Choruses by Calcott and Somervell, and music to 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' were included. Under the joint-conductorship of Messrs. H. E. Crocker and W. L. Twining, the Torquay Musical Association gave a programme of part-songs and instrumental pieces. The choir sang with good quality of tone and effect, allowance being made for weakness in the minor parts, their most important numbers being Elgar's 'The snow' (female voices in three parts) and 'Angelus' (four-part), Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to Music,' and German's 'My bonnie lass.' Members of the band, in collaboration with Mrs. W. H. Mortimer, played Sterndale Bennett's Sextet, Op. 8; and Grieg's 'Holberg' Suite was played by all the strings.

Gaul's 'Holy City' was sung on December 11 in Paignton Wesleyan Church, with Mr. E. W. Goss at the organ and Mr. L. Jupp conducting; and in St. Paul's Church, Preston, Paignton, on the same evening, Mr. F. Benson gave a recital to 'open' a new organ.

Totnes Choral Society, on December 12, sang the 'Hymn of Praise,' directed by Mr. Herbert Worth. The chief instrumental number was Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, Miss Evelyn Hingston being the soloist, and Mr. Arthur Coombe leading the band.

Holsworthy Philharmonic Society, on December 12, sang Smart's 'The bride of Dunkerron' with band, under the baton of Mr. H. H. Bennett, with Miss Fifine de la Côte and Messrs. Orlando Joliffe and John Prout as principals.

A special event deserves special mention, the performance at Exmouth of Elgar's 'The Music Makers' by the Choral Society, with band. This was the first performance in the west, and great credit was due to the conductor, Mr. Raymond Wilmot, for the artistic comprehension of the work which he displayed, and with which he inspired his singers. The choir was small, but beautiful in tone, accurate in knowledge of the text, and expressive in interpretation. Miss Alice Lakin was the soloist.

Torquay Municipal Orchestra has firmly established itself in symphonic reputation, and at the third concert of this kind, on December 11, Dvorák's No. 5 in E minor (from the 'New World') was played with much insight. The 'Fidelio' Overture, and Tchaikovsky's Concerto in D, for violin (Mr. Anton Maaskoff) and orchestra were part of the scheme conducted by Mr. Basil Hindenberg. Teignmouth Orchestral Society was conducted by Mr. A. J. James, on December 11, in works by Schubert, Haydn, and Jarnfeldt, suited to the size of the band (thirty-three performers). Mr. Isador Epstein played pianoforte solos by Rachmaninoff, Chopin, Grieg, Liszt, and Cyril Scott, and Miss Florence Mellors sang. A chamber concert of vocal and instrumental solos and quartets was given by Mrs. Fletcher Watson at Paignton on December 2. On December 4, at Exmouth, Miss Rachel Fell added a sixth to her invaluable list of chamber concerts. Recitals by M. Paderewski at Torquay and Exeter in the last week of November, under the direction of Messrs. Paish & Co., must be mentioned.

CORNWALL.

It has been decided to re-start the St. Blazey, Par, and District Choral Society, with Mr. W. B. Smith as conductor; and with the purpose of giving definite form to a desire to start a choral Society in Cubert, to be conducted by Mr. J. Behenna, a programme of instrumental quartets and choruses was given in the village on November 21. At the Chair Eisteddfod at Queen's Hall (London), on November 20, the Marazion Male Choir obtained fifty-four marks out of a possible 100. Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm was sung in Redruth Wesleyan Church on November 21, with band, conducted by Mr. H. Dennis. The Mullion Choral Society were joined by a choir from the Council School in a concert on December 4, and Delabole Wesleyan Choir gave a service of song on that date. A first appearance was made by St. Austell Glee and Madrigal Society on December 5, and, under the baton of Mr. C. L. Forrester, sang part-songs, a choral ode, and glees; and Fowey Church choir were conducted by Mr. W. B. S. Hawken in part-songs on December 11.

Mr. Faulkener Muten gave a lecture-recital on Mendelssohn, on December 5, at Calstock.

DUBLIN.

On November 20 the Dublin Orchestral Society gave the fourth concert for the season in the Gaiety Theatre. Signor Simonetti played the Beethoven Violin concerto extremely well. We are fortunate in having such an admirable player resident in Dublin. Weber's 'Oberon' Overture; a Largo from Handel's 'Concerto Grosso' No. 2; a Gavotte from Mozart's 'Idomeneo'; the Prelude to Act 3 and the 'Apprentices' dance' from the 'Meistersinger,' and Dvorák's 'Carneval' Overture completed the programme, conducted by Dr. Esposito.

On December 13 the Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and 'Athalie.' Dr. Charles Marchant conducted, and the soloists were Madame Borel, Miss Edith Mortier, and Mr. J. J. Maltby (Chester).

The chamber music recitals at the Royal Dublin Society have been given during the past month by the following artists: Mr. Frank Muspratt (organ); the Brodsky Quartet, with Mr. E. Mills (clarinet), the programme including Mozart's and Brahms's Clarinet quintets and Bach's Chaconne, played by Dr. Brodsky; Dr. Esposito, Signor Simonetti, and Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees, who may be called 'The Dublin Trio'; and the Wessely Quartet.

At the Sunday Orchestral Concerts the following works have been played during the past month: Beethoven's fourth and seventh, and Mozart's 'Jupiter,' Symphonies, Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' incidental music. The soloists included Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees (violin), M. Octave Grisard (violin), Mr. P. J. Griffith (who played an 'Irish Fantasy' by Hamilton Harty for violin and pianoforte), and Miss Edith Kelly (violin). Vocalists included Mr. H. Harris, Miss Lena Munro, Madame Eira Haise, Miss Eleanor Good, and Madame Borel.

The Leinster School of Music gave a concert in connection with a distribution of prizes on December 14. The orchestra was conducted by Mr. Joshua F. Watson.

On Thursday, December 5, Mr. Stanley Cochrane gave a private concert for the formal opening of a magnificent concert hall and theatre which he has built at his house near Bray. It is just what is wanted in Dublin, and pity 'tis that it is not in the city, as it seats some 1,600 in the auditorium and has perfect acoustic properties. Dr. Esposito, Signor Simonetti, and Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees played trios and a solo each. Songs were given by Madame Borel and Mr. Melfort D'Alton, and Mr. T. H. Weaving and Mr. C. W. Wilson were the accompanists.

On December 18, the Dublin Orchestral Society gave the fifth concert of the present season. The programme included Bach's Suite No. 3. in D, Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony, Tchaikovsky's 'Rococo' Variations (solo cello, Mr. Clyde Twelveteetres), Esposito's 'Berceuse,' and Wagner's Funeral March (Götterdämmerung) and Meistersinger Overture.

GLASGOW.

The first of the Scottish Orchestra's concerts under municipal auspices took place on November 20, and was an unequalled success. The City Hall was filled to overflowing, and hundreds of people were unable to gain admission. The programme, although unrelieved by vocal or instrumental solos, maintained throughout the unflagging interest of the vast audience.

The chief feature of the third Classical Concert, on November 26, was Mr. Eugen D'Albert's superb playing of Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto. It is interesting to recall that the performance took place within a stone-cast of the distinguished pianist's birth-place. Mr. Paul Kochanski, a pupil of Mr. Mlynarski, was solo violinist at the fourth Classical Concert on December 3. Since this young player's former appearance at these concerts, his style has considerably matured, and his performance of Lalo's Violin concerto in F minor was marked by faultless technique and great warmth of feeling. The programme also included a fine reading of Brahms's second Symphony. At the fifth concert, on December 10, two well-contrasted novelties were given, viz., P. E. Bach's Concerto in D major for small orchestra (orchestrated by Steinberg) and Debussy's 'Scottish March on a popular theme.' Mr. Mlynarski's Symphony in F major (Op. 14), given here for the first time last year, was repeated, and Miss Agnes Nicholls was solo vocalist.

The Orpheus Choir, conducted with such distinction by Mr. Hugh S. Robertson, gave a Scottish Classical Concert on December 5. The programme consisted of choral arrangements of Scottish songs, subjects written by Scotsmen and treated chorally by composers of any nationality, and original part-songs by Scottish composers. As exponents of the 'new choralism' the Choir occupies a unique place, and their singing of fifteen unaccompanied pieces, entirely from memory, was so uniformly good that particularization is somewhat difficult. Possibly their best efforts were Bantock's 'Scotland yet,' Lambeth's 'The flowers of the forest,' Walter Hately's 'Diaphenia,' and the conductor's own 'Reverie.' Miss Jean Waterston and Mr. Robert Burnett as solo vocalists sang several of Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser's 'Hebridean songs,' and Mr. Burnett brought to a first public hearing in Glasgow Mr. T. S. Drummond's prize-ballad, 'The dowie dens o' Yarrow.' Mr. Wilfrid Senior played the pianoforte accompaniments with excellent taste.

Mr. Elkan Kosman, who was leader of the orchestra under Mr. August Manns in the days of the Choral Union régime, made a welcome re-appearance as solo violinist at the Saturday Popular Orchestral Concert on November 23. A much appreciated innovation at the Saturday concert on November 30, was the choral singing by that section of the Choral Union which gained the second prize in the premier class at the Paris Competitive Festival last May. The prize choir, under the clever conductorship of Mr. Henri Verbrugghen sang the Festival test-pieces, distinguishing themselves specially in that exacting number Chapuis's 'The two fiddlers.'

The performance of 'The Messiah' by the Hamilton Choral Society (Mr. T. S. Drummond, conductor), on December 11, was probably the best the Society has yet given. The choruses were all sung with splendid effect, and the solo music was given by Misses Jean Cunningham and Agnes Millar, and Messrs. Herbert Thorpe and Appleton Moore. An effective orchestra, led by Mr. A. Daebliß, and supplemented at the organ by Mr. B. W. Hartley, played the accompaniments.

The Bach Choir (Mr. J. M. Diack, conductor) gave their first choral concert for the season in St. Mary's Cathedral on December 16. The programme included 'Sleepers, wake,' 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure,' and some accompanied and unaccompanied chorales, in the singing of which the choir showed a fine intelligence. Mr. J. T. Pattman's accompaniments on the organ were excellent.

One of the outstanding events of this season was the performance—the first in Scotland—of Mr. Granville Bantock's 'Omar Khayyam,' on December 17. A special interest attaches to the occasion inasmuch as the work was conducted by the composer, and consequently the best reading was to be expected. Considering the difficulties of Mr. Bantock's choral writing the Choral Union acquitted themselves with credit, and on this result Mr. Verbrugghen, the chorus-master, is to be congratulated. The Scottish Orchestra, augmented to ninety performers, played the instrumental part admirably, and the solo music by Miss Doris Woodall and Messrs. Frank Mullings and Robert Maitland was in all respects worthy of the occasion. Much of the success of the performance was due to Mr. Bantock's able and alert direction.

At a largely attended public meeting, on December 16, convened by the Executive of the Glasgow Choral Festival, Mr. Bantock delivered a stimulating address on the artistic and educational value of the Competitive Festival movement.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The fourth Philharmonic Concert on November 19 gave Mr. Landon Ronald an opportunity of showing his interpretative command as a conductor of music differing so widely in scope as Haydn's Symphony in G, Letter 'V' (No. 13, B. & H.), and Strauss's Symphonic-poem 'Don Juan,' Op. 20, of which a vivid performance was given. Mr. Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris Dance' for seven-part string band greatly commended itself on a first hearing, especially as an essay in an attractive rhythmic form, although not actually based upon authentic folk-music tunes. Liszt's E flat Pianoforte concerto was a congenial medium for the display of Miss Irene Scharrer's vivacious and brilliant style. Equally successful was the singing of Professor Leon Rains, a baritone who uses a beautiful voice with resourceful art. The choir had their opportunity in two effective part-songs, 'My delight and thy delight' (Sir Hubert Parry), and 'As the moon's soft splendour' (C. Wood).

At the fifth concert, on December 3, Sir Frederic Cowen returned to his accustomed post to conduct Beethoven's 'Pastoral Symphony,' Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel,' Wolf-Ferrari's Waltz-prelude to the third act of 'Jewels of the Madonna,' and Tchaikovsky's 'Marche Slav.' The scheme also included two groups of Lieder by Brahms and Wolf, in which Miss Elena Gerhardt exhibited her accustomed art. The choir sang Lee Williams's harmonically effective part-song 'The Haven,' with commendable expression.

It is satisfactory to note that Mr. Vasco Akeroyd's Symphony Orchestra Concerts retain a firm hold on public favour. Mr. Akeroyd has got together a fine array of the best local players, led by Mr. Alfred Ross, and has long since developed into a notably capable conductor. The programme of the third concert on November 26 was devoted to Wagner and Tchaikovsky, whose fourth Symphony was especially well presented. The vocalist was Madame Donalda.

For Mr. Percy Harrison's second concert, on November 27, a miscellaneous programme was successfully sustained by Madame Aino Ackté, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Señor Casals (solo cello), and Mr. R. J. Forbes (pianist). Madame Ackté's gifts as a dramatic soprano of the first order were fully exhibited.

Those who were fortunate in attending the Beethoven pianoforte recital given by Mr. Frederic Lamond on December 7, will long retain a pleasant memory of this remarkable performance of three great Sonatas—the C minor, Op. 111, the 'Waldstein,' Op. 53, and the 'Sonata Appassionata,' Op. 57.

The Liverpool Societä Armonica is the oldest amateur orchestral Society in the Kingdom. Founded in 1847, it has continued its useful course and exercised a wide influence in local music for an unbroken period of sixty-five years. Its outlook has been of much wider scope since 1896, when Mr. Akeroyd became conductor, and the present combination of ninety amateur and professional players, both ladies and gentlemen, finds no difficulty in essaying even abstruse problems of modern orchestral music. At the 157th concert of the Society, on December 7, Mr. Akeroyd conducted a performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony which had many good points. No less interesting hearing was Weber's 'Euryanthe' Overture, and Svendsen's 'Carnival in Paris.' Miss Lena Kontorovich, a young violinist possessing temperament and technical equipment, played extremely well in Max Bruch's 'Scottish Fantasia,' Op. 46, and Mr. Plunkett Greene sang in characteristic style songs by Wood, J. R. Dear, and Stanford. Mr. H. P. Simpson has taken over the duties of hon. secretary which Mr. Dudley Johnston until recently discharged with distinction.

The earnest appeal made to the Catholic community for increased support to the Catholic Philharmonic Society has had the desired effect, and their concert on December 9 was largely attended. It established a record in this respect. There now appears to be no immediate fear of dissolution, as was the case last season. This more cheerful outlook, upon which all concerned are heartily to be congratulated, was not without its effect on the performance of Beethoven's Mass in C, which, together with other elaborate service-music, is no longer to be heard in Roman churches, having come under the Papal ban. It may be said with truth that the singers, both principals and choir, exhibited a sense of reverence as well as excellent technical preparation. As on previous occasions, the choral-singing was marked by intelligence and expression. The soloists were Madame Eva Warren, Madame Engelhard, Signor Piero Gherardi, and Mr. John Lacey. The orchestra, led by Mr. Akeroyd, and with Mr. Frank Bertrand at the pianoforte, was pleasantly heard in Handel's Concerto Grosso (No. 1), and Mr. Arthur Catterall gave a masterly performance of the solo part in Beethoven's Violin concerto. The Society has an able conductor in Mr. H. P. Allen.

The large gatherings at the fortnightly meetings of the Rodewald Concert Club, testify to the wisdom of the promoters in permitting the distillation of tobacco as an aid to musical digestion. The conditions in no way increased the complexities of Max Reger's Trio in E minor, Op. 102, which formed part of the programme played by the Manchester Trio. On December 9, at the fifth meeting, the programme was sustained by two clever young local musicians, Mr. Vivian Burrows (violin) and Mr. Josef Greene (pianoforte). The Brodsky Quartet, assisted by Mr. Isidor Cohn at the pianoforte, gave their first chamber concert on November 23, when the programme contained Haydn's Quartet in F, Op. 77, No. 2, Richard Strauss's Pianoforte quartet in C minor, Op. 13, and Beethoven's great string quartet, Op. 130.

Recent happenings worthy of note include the dramatic recital given in the Yamen Rooms on November 28 by Miss Linda Gibbs, who was assisted by Miss Claire Loveland (pianoforte) and Miss Gladys Lederer (mezzo-soprano); and the recital given in the Rushworth Hall on December 2 by Miss Agnes Johns (pianoforte), Miss Ethel Penhall (contralto), and Miss Adrienne Bergsma (violin), three ladies who exhibited considerable skill. Musical interest was added to the delightful art of Mr. Frank Speaight's 'Dickens recital' on December 4 by the singing of Madame Henriette Engelhard in a well-chosen programme of English lieder.

A feature of the programme of the Liscard Orchestral Society, on November 30, was the Suite composed for this Society by Mr. Gordon E. Stutely on the subject of 'Red Riding Hood.' The Adagio from Reinecke's Pianoforte concerto, Op. 72, was played by Mr. Stanley Prescott and the large orchestra, capably conducted by Mr. Philip Smart.

On the Lancashire side of the river similar amateur enterprise was shown by the Blundellsands Orchestral Society at their recent concert, when Mr. Arnold Trowell appeared as composer and soloist in his own Violoncello concerto. Mr. Akeroyd conducted.

The Walton Philharmonic Society gave a creditable performance, conducted by Mr. Albert Orton, on December 12, of Gade's 'The Erl King's Daughter' and Stanford's 'Revenge,' the vocal principals being Madame Cairns Owen, Miss Annie Beattie, and Mr. J. C. Brien, with Mr. Edward Watson at the pianoforte.

The popular concert-version of German's 'Merrie England' occupied the attention of the Ormskirk Musical Association on December 4. The vocal soloists were Mrs. Robert Walker, Miss Hilda Cragg-James, Mr. George Barnett, and Mr. W. H. Heaton. To Mr. John Ball as conductor, Miss Clucas as accompanist, and the band and choir of 120, credit is due for a bright and con amore performance.

Mr. A. W. Speed conducted a performance by choir and orchestra of 'Elijah' in Chapel Street Congregational Church, Southport, on December 10, when the vocal principals were Miss Alice Hare, Miss Gladys Palmer, Mr. Sam Hemsall, and Mr. Joseph Lycett, with Mr. C. K. Killip as organist. Mr. Speed is now preparing for a performance of Elgar's 'The Apostles,' to be given in Holy Trinity Church, Southport, on March 14.

The Liverpool Village Choir, an organization of young people, mainly of school children whose gifts of song have been skilfully developed and directed by Mr. R. T. Edwards, gave a concert in the Philharmonic Hall at which they were assisted by the Southport Vocal Union of male voices, conducted by Mr. J. C. Clarke. The success of the Village Choir in the recent Paris Competitions is generally known. The qualities and training of the youthful singers were also exhibited in one of the test-pieces, 'Beauteous morn' (German), in the 'Galway Piper,' 'A cobbler there was' (P. E. Fletcher), and 'A Welsh rhapsody' (Vincent). The combination of children's voices with the robust tones of the male-voice choir was not a success.

Sir Frederic Cowen's tuneful early work 'St. John's Eve' was performed, with orchestra, by the Post Office Choral Society on December 12, when their lately appointed conductor, Mr. Arthur Davies, obtained good results, especially from his choral material. The soloists were Miss Doris Carter, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Frank Slater, and Mr. R. Ramsey Clarke.

A successful experiment was made by the Welsh Choral Union in giving two performances of the 'Messiah' on the afternoon and evening of December 14. There were large audiences, especially in the evening, when the singing of the famous Welsh Choir displayed all their accustomed and unexcelled qualities, stimulated rather than fatigued by the labours of the afternoon. The vocal principals were Miss Emily Breare, Miss Amalfi, Mr. Morgan Kingston, and Mr. Julien Henry, and, as conductor, Mr. Harry Evans inspired his forces with responsiveness and enthusiasm.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

The thoughts uppermost in the minds of music-lovers in Manchester during the closing weeks of the old year were not so much of the enjoyment which the month's music had brought them, but of the probable outcome of Michael Balling's businesslike presentation of the case for a practical remodelling of the base on which the Hallé Concerts Society rests. To an assembly of guarantors (who alone can elect the executive), subscribers, and friends he fearlessly said that, in a way, the present system of guarantee (now 185 persons with a life liability of £100 each) was almost a hindrance to development, inasmuch as the executive were unwilling to embark on a more or less adventurous 'forward' policy, lest its possible failure might entail too severe a call on the guarantors, who in the last fifteen years had had to respond to two calls, involving them in less than £1 per annum each. 'Why, it cost more to print the names of the guarantors on the programme books during all those years!' he said with fine ironic emphasis. Of course only persons of some substance could comply with the Hallé guarantee conditions, and until now there has been shown little disposition to try and tap other sources—keen and devoted patrons of the concerts, who, whilst both unable and unwilling to assume the larger burden for a life-period, are both willing and able to shoulder a smaller one for a briefer space.

At a meeting of the guarantors, held on December 13, it was shown that the losses on the Manchester concerts of the Society had been £600 in 1909-10; £1,066 in Richter's last season (1910-11), and £387 in 1911-12 (guest-conductors). It was reported that subscriptions had dropped from (in round figures) £6,000 in 1905-6 to £4,600 in the current year, entirely due to the decrease in the number of subscribers for the highest-priced seats. In Sir Charles Hallé's time it was stated that the cost of the orchestra per concert was £105; to-day it averages £140. Extra rehearsals cost £50 each; Balling has secured eight of these for the current season, but feels that at least twenty are necessary—hence the need for additional income. To meet these difficulties Mr. Gustav Behrens, the treasurer, suggested two appeals:

(a.) To the wealthy and generous guarantors that they allow the balance of their unpaid guarantees or a portion thereof, to be funded, and the interests therefrom devoted towards annual expenses, such payments freeing guarantors pro tanto from further liability (the original guarantee was for £100, and only ended when the entire £100 had been called up or by the death of the guarantor).

(b.) To the general public for promised contributions, say annually for five years.

Fifty of the 185 existing guarantors have agreed to comply with these suggestions, and a capital sum of £5,000 will raise a steady £200; but £1,000 is wanted. Clearly more than this will have to be raised from this source; the probabilities of the City Council coming in as helpers are too remote at present. If the Society is once put on a safe footing, and then can go to the City Council and offer to do certain work in the way of good and cheap orchestral concerts, perhaps there might be more hope of a Corporation subvention. Should all the guarantors see their way to do as fifty of them have already promised, the financial problem is pretty well solved, for the smaller amounts of support, spread over a period, will appeal to a great many more people than the 185 who are guarantors.

At the last concert the programme included Strauss's 'Macbeth' poem, Korngold's 'A Winter's Tale' Overture, and Bruckner's ninth Symphony (which the composer considered complete only when the earlier monumental Te Deum rounded off the performance). Candour compels the confession that this famous symphonic work fell distinctly flat; the tedium of its meandering thematic material was relieved but slightly by the beauty of the brass-wind orchestration, which made the string and wood-wind appear quite pallid in comparison. The conductor asserted that works on so vast a scale cannot be adequately prepared with the present inadequate means for rehearsal.

The Overture to 'A Winter's Tale,' by Korngold (the subject of an interesting column-long sketch in the Manchester Guardian) would easily have stood out as the most interesting work on the evening of its performance, even had it not been known to be the first orchestral work of a youngster who cannot by any possible chance have had much experience of orchestral concerts at his age.

Probably most Manchester people would agree in awarding the chief distinction of the month to the successive visits during December of Aekté, Gerhardt, and Muriel Foster, at the Harrison Gentlemen's and Bowdon Chamber concerts respectively. Each in her own way gives peculiar and full satisfaction. Aekté, with her tremendous prodigality of emotional experience, Muriel Foster so earnest and intense, Gerhardt supreme in the swiftness of her touch and instantaneous adjustment of voice and mentality.

The Manchester Musical Society still pursues its adventurous policy of arranging one-composer programmes, but the proximity of Christmas led to the postponement of Julius Harrison's visit on December 20. Its annual soirée on December 13 was a great success, the amateur members of the Society giving the programme. Hugo Wolf's 'Suleika' song, in Mr. Samuel Langford's translation, was sung by Mr. F. Bamber.

On December 12, Miss Gertrude Bloomfield, a well-known Manchester lady, was joined by Miss Gertrude Lonsdale in a recital which brought many new songs to the notice of concert-goers here—a most representative collection of works by modern-European song-writers, Marx, Hué, Merlartin, Rummel, Flangay. These few names show how the recitalists left the beaten track.

A former critic of the Manchester Courier, Mr. Norman Hayes, finding the combined tasks of business and journalism too severe a tax, dropped the latter and served manum for a space. Now he has deserted this, and taken up musical composition, writing delightful strains to Judge Parry's 'Katawampus,' produced at our Gaiety Theatre for Christmas last two or three years since. On Boxing Day this year, this is to be produced at the Zürich Stadt Theater, to a German translation of Frau Lina Schüler, and coincidentally Mr. Hayes's new opera 'Fifinella' has been staged by the Liverpool Repertory Theatre.

The Stockport Vocal Union, under their new conductor, Dr. Keighley, seems to be following the lines of the Manchester Vocal Society in its cultivation of choral miniatures.

The Catholic Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. H. P. Allen, gave Beethoven's Mass in C, now but rarely heard, on December 11. More whole-hearted support of this effort is certainly the Society's due; were the works sung to be given in the Roman Catholic Cathedral in Salford, possibly the congregations would be much greater than are the audiences in a secular building.

The Beethoven Amateur Orchestral Society gave the first concert of their twenty-fifth season on December 10, under Mr. Gordon Cockrell. Max Bruch's No. 3 Symphony and Scharwenka's B flat minor Pianoforte concerto (Miss Edith Webster) were the principal works played. The Society owed its inception to Mr. Cockrell, whose activities in its behalf have stirred the members and their friends to celebrate this anniversary by the presentation of an illuminated address and cheque, Mr. F. M. Hertz making the presentation on December 17.

The various chamber-music Societies of the district are now in full swing, keeping busy the numerous trios and quartets which have sprung up in the last few years; but the most impressive feature of the winter, thus far, is the astounding success of popular orchestral music. Our Saturday night crowds must provide food for much thought to some occupying the 'Seats of the Mighty' in this city.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

Mr. Granville Bantock paid his third visit to the city as conductor on November 27, when the Choral Union and the Hallé Orchestra gave the first part of 'Omar Khayyám.' His vivid and characteristic 'choralization' (if one may coin a word to correspond with 'orchestration') was admirably suited to the choir, which, as the result of the training of Dr. Coward, produced many notable effects. There was a rhythmic vitality and a feeling for colour in the choral singing which reciprocated the sensuousness of the orchestral writing. Miss Phyllis Lett and Mr. Frank Mullings sang the parts of the Beloved and the Poet with much distinction, and Mr. Herbert Parker was admirable as the Philosopher. The concert opened with Bantock's 'Dante and Beatrice' Overture, a work possessing many points of beauty and interest. Darlington Choral and Orchestral Society revived 'Judas Maccabæus,' on December 10, under the baton of Mr. T. Henderson, and the following evening four numbers by younger British writers were given by the Newcastle Harmonic Society. Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean,' Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah,' three 'Vagabond Songs' by Ernest Farrar, and a pair of songs by the conductor, Mr. E. L. Bainton, formed a creditable group of novelties, and showed the power of the newer men to pen attractive music. The choir were careful in matters of light and shade, and Miss Dorothy Silk, though struggling with indisposition, sang with beautiful finish. Madame Aekté, Señor Casals, and Mr. Gervase Elwes were an admirable, if strongly contrasted, trio at the Harrison concert on November 28, and the programme, though not over-serious in matter, was much better than is usual at these series. The Classical Concert Society and Chamber Music Society have both had meetings. The former provided a most delightful recital by Mr. York Bowen and Mr. Lionel Tertis. A clever Sonata by the former, and two beautiful movements from a Suite by Benjamin Dale, showed the recitalists at their best; the superb viola-playing of Mr. Tertis and Mr. Bowen's brilliant pianism were a striking comment on the powers of our native artists. The older Society gave one of their quartet concerts, the combination being the Sevcik.

Mr. Alfred Wall, the leader of the Philharmonic Orchestra, played with sureness of technique and breadth of tone Beethoven's Concerto for violin at the second concert of that organization on December 12, and gave a calm, dignified performance of this classic. The rest of the programme was gay and bright—Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, Hamilton Hart's 'Comedy Overture,' and Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance.' Mr. E. L. Bainton conducted, and gave readings of sound merit.

The Quinlan Opera Company visited the Theatre Royal during the first week of December, and their performances reached the high-water mark of opera in Newcastle. 'Tristan,' 'Lohengrin,' 'Figaro,' 'Louise,' 'Les Bohèmes' and 'Tales of Hoffmann' (twice), were staged. Mr. Quinlan promised to present the 'Ring' in April.

NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

The Norwich Philharmonic Society, in conjunction with the Norwich Choral Society, under the direction of Dr. Bates, gave a performance of 'Tannhäuser' at St. Andrews Hall on December 5, the vocalists engaged being Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Adelaide Kind, and Miss Gwladys Lindsa, and Messrs. Alfred Heather, Herbert Heyner, Humphrey Bishop, David Brazell, Herbert Tracey, A. E. Benson, and S. Hemmings. The concert was attended by a large audience.

A performance of Dvůrák's 'Stabat Mater' was given on December 12 at the Town Hall, Great Yarmouth, under the conductorship of Mr. Haydon Hare, the principals engaged being Miss Euneta Truscott, Miss D. Hayward Webb, Mr. Richard Ripley, and Mr. Frederic Ranalow. The chorists, who had been trained by Mr. Haydon Hare, acquitted themselves with distinction. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous programme, to which each of the artists referred to contributed, and in addition, a young musician from New Zealand, Master Haydon Beck, who is now training at Brussels Conservatoire, played a violin solo.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The Nottingham Charity Subscription Concerts opened their season on November 21, when the Beecham Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Miss Agnes Nicholls, gave the entire programme. The chief features of the programme were the brilliant performance of Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman' Overture, the 'New World' Symphony (Dvůrák), and the dances from Borodin's opera 'Prince Igor.'

The pianoforte and vocal recital given on November 25 by Miss Cantelo and Robert Radford—both natives of this city—proved in every way a musical treat. Both artists were heard at their best.

At the orchestral concert given by the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society, on November 28, under the direction of Mr. Allen Gill, the chief attractions were Brahms's 'Academic' Overture and Beethoven's fifth Symphony. A special word should be said of the beauty of tone in the violin solo played by Mr. Wynne Reeves in an 'Intermezzo' by Mr. Eric Coates. The vocalist was Mr. Edward Davies.

The Long Eaton Choral Society scored a decided success in their performance of 'Elijah' on November 26. They were happy in obtaining the services of Mr. Robert Radford, ably supported by Miss Christine Bywater, Miss May Peters, and Mr. Henry Brearley. Mr. Smeeton ably conducted, and Mr. Mountney led the orchestra.

At the Nottingham Subscription Concert on December 5, Madame Carreño delighted the audience with her magnificent playing, as did Madame Doris Woodall and Mr. Gervase Elwes with their singing.

On December 12, the Grantham Symphony Orchestral Society gave a concert under the direction of Mr. Edward Elmsere, the programme consisting of the works of Sibelius, Wagner, Weber, Tchaikovsky, and Rachmaninoff. Vocal solos were given by Miss Edythe Monson.

An enthusiastic reception was given to the performance of 'Samson' by the Gainsborough Choral Society on December 12. The solos were undertaken by Miss Nellie Judson, Miss Eva Roberts, Mr. Herbert Teale, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth. The choir and orchestra were ably directed by Mr. W. A. Montgomery.

OXFORD.

The first concert of the term took place in the Town Hall on October 19, when Herr Kreisler gave an excellent recital.

On October 23 Dr. Allen, with his Oxford Orchestra, gave a concert in the same building in aid of the Orchestra Library, which during the last eight years has been obliged to spend a considerable sum in the purchase of scores and parts. The principal pieces presented were Beethoven's 'Leonora' Overture (No. 3) and Schubert's Symphony in C major, both being excellently interpreted.

On October 31, in the Assembly Room of the Town Hall, Mr. A. J. Newcombe and his party gave an interesting chamber concert, consisting entirely of French music, the principal items being Debussy's Quartet in G minor, Op. 10, and César Franck's Quintet in F minor. Later in the term a 'Russian' programme was given with equal success.

On November 8 great interest was centred in the concert given in the Town Hall by Madame Carreño and Herr Backhaus, a joint pianoforte recital being quite a novelty in Oxford. On November 15 came Paderewski, who gave an afternoon recital in the same building to a crowded house.

On December 12 an excellent concert was given in the Town Hall under the auspices of the Musical Club, by Dr. Allen's Orchestra, supplemented by wind players from London. It opened with the beautiful 'Caucasian Sketch' by Ippolitov-Ivanov, which is mainly built upon a dance-measure of a 'nationalistic' type, and very charmingly instrumented. César Franck's Symphonic-poem for pianoforte and orchestra, 'Les Djinn's,' and Brahms's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in B flat (Op. 83) were also performed, Mr. Egon Petri taking the solo part in both pieces with great taste and good judgment. Beethoven's eighth Symphony (Op. 93) concluded a thoroughly excellent concert, Dr. Allen conducting throughout with his usual ability.

The following day in the Sheldonian Theatre Sir Walter Parratt gave his annual terminal lecture on 'The brass instruments of the orchestra' to an appreciative audience. The genial professor began by saying that 'brass' as a rule was generally maligned (!), but the brass instruments of the orchestra could fortunately not only play very loudly, but could produce some of the most beautiful pianissimo effects imaginable. Several illustrations were given on the horn, trumpet, and trombone, and perhaps the most enjoyable and effective of all was the horn solo in the Nocturne from Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream.' The lecture was full of sensible hints to young composers, and ought to be much valued by them. But it is unfortunate that these lectures are always placed in the last week of term, when undergraduates are in for 'schools,' and are as a rule unable to attend.

Sunday concerts at Balliol College have been continued as usual under the able direction of Dr. Walker.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

An old-established local organization, the Sheffield Choral Union, is entering upon a spirited revival under the enterprise of a few enthusiasts. Lieutenant Suckley, a former conductor, has resumed command, and the old and new members are flocking to the choral banner. Mendelssohn's 'Loreley,' and a concert-version of Gounod's 'Faust,' performed in the Albert Hall, demonstrated the thoroughness of the awakening. The female voices were bright and of good quality, and in precision and diction some excellent discipline was secured. The soloists were Miss Parker-Machon, who sang very bravely in the taxing Finale of 'Loreley,' Miss Elsie Suckley, Mr. D. C. Leng, and Mr. William Burrows.

Handel's 'Samson' still retains its popularity among the smaller Yorkshire choral bodies. The Sheffield Victoria Hall Choral Society performed the oratorio in their spacious hall under the direction of Mr. H. C. Jackson. There was a commendable solidity about their singing, which was suitable to certain choruses in the work. They sang the beautiful 'Lament' very expressively. But the choir lacked spring and alertness. A modern cantata, exhaustively studied, would act like a tonic on a Society which reveals many fine potential qualities. There was a small orchestra, and the soloists were Miss Bessie Unwin, Miss May Bull, Mr. G. W. Riley, and Mr. Robert Charlesworth.

The Rotherham Choral Society, after a series of ambitious concerts, devoted their half-season energies to choral works in the smaller forms, to the evident enjoyment of a large audience. Mr. T. Brameld directed his well-trained and responsive forces in Buck's 'Hymn to Music,' Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees,' and works by German, Mendelssohn, Elgar, Moellendorff, and Lee Williams.

Coleridge-Taylor's 'Meg Blane' is from time to time heard in the Sheffield district, where the impression it created on its production at the Festival of 1902 is still remembered. The St. John's (Abbeyle) Choral Society coupled the vivid work with Macfarren's more orthodox 'May-Day,' and the small but by no means tentative choir gave a good account of both compositions under Mr. G. A. Seed's competent direction.

A new Miniature Symphony in D, for full orchestra, the work of a Sheffield composer, Mr. Frank H. Shera, was produced at the concert of the Philharmonic (Senior) Orchestra on December 6. Mr. Shera has retained the outlines of a symphony, but with reduced dimensions. The thematic material is good, it occasionally reminiscent, and the scoring shows enterprise and a sure touch. The work is well planned, but a trifle too economic where extension would enhance the interest, and the general impression made on a representative audience was favourable. At the same concert Bennett's 'Paradise and the Peri' Overture and Sibelius's 'Finlandia' were played under the direction of Mr. J. H. Parkes.

The same conductor directed the Junior section of the orchestra on the following night. The young people, nearly 100 strong, played neatly in Beethoven's newly discovered 'Jena' Symphony, and some lighter pieces. Mr. W. H. Peasegood played organ solos.

Mr. Frederick Dawson conducted an interesting concert given by the Sheffield Amateur Instrumental Society. The playing of the orchestra has palpably improved during the past two seasons. Their programmes are well chosen and of fresh interest. The Symphony was by C. P. E. Bach, in D, and other works played were Liszt's Tone-poem 'Orpheus,' Beethoven's 'Fidelio' Overture, and the Valse from Korngold's 'Der Schneemann.' Miss Alice Walker (in Schumann's Concertstück, Op. 92) and Mr. Alfred Barker were the soloists.

The Barnsley St. Cecilia Society gave a successful concert in the Public Hall under the firm control of the new conductor, Mr. Joseph Soar. The choir sang with admirable vigour and point in Stanford's 'The Revenge,' and Hubert Bath's 'Wedding of Shon Maclean.'

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

At the beginning of the season there promised to be a 'slump' in orchestral music at Leeds, but since then there have been some signs of a greater activity. A strong committee has been formed to carry on, as Popular Saturday Orchestral Concerts, the old 'Municipal' Concerts, on which the Corporation had declined to spend even the modest amount necessary to balance their accounts. Four will be given in January, February, and March, under the direction of Mr. Fricker, and with practically the same efficient orchestra of local professionals as before. Seeing the ground unoccupied, Mr. Julian Clifford, the musical director of the Harrogate Kursaal, has in the meantime stepped into the breach, and has announced a series of these Saturday orchestral concerts, two of which have already taken place. Catering for a popular audience, the first, on November 30, consisted of such familiar favourites as the 'Zampa,' 'Mignon' and '1812' Overtures, the first 'Peer Gynt' Suite, Handel's 'celebrated Largo,' and the Miserere Scene from 'Trovatore,' in which Madame Blanche Marchesi and a local tenor, Mr. Habbeshaw, appeared. The only novelty was a pleasing waltz by Glazounow. Mr. Clifford secured some very smart performances from his capable orchestra, of which Mr. John Lawson, of Liverpool, is the leader. On December 14 he gave a typical Wagner programme, which met with even greater success.

On November 27 the Leeds Choral Union, under Dr. Coward's direction, gave Berlioz's 'Faust.' The choir sang with tremendous enthusiasm and force, and the principal parts were well sung by Miss Ada Forrest, Mr. Henry Brearley, Mr. Robert Burnett, and Mr. Marsden Williams (Brander). The Leeds New Choral Society are this season relying entirely on Elgar for their programme, having selected for performance his 'Olaf' and 'Caractacus.' The former was given on December 4, when Mr. H. M. Turton secured a choral performance that was fresh, intelligent, and showed the results of careful training. Miss Lillian Dillingham, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Bridge Peters were the principals. The only other choral performance to record is that of Brahms's 'German Requiem,' which, according to a well-established custom, was given at the Parish Church on December 11, under Dr. Bairstow's direction. Sung with the ease which familiarity has given, it produces, under these conditions, a really impressive and devotional effect. At the concert of the Leeds Bohemian Society, on the same evening, the programme comprised String quartets by Sinding (in A minor, Op. 70), Sergius Taniewicz (B flat minor, Op. 4), and Haydn (E flat, Op. 76, No. 6), of which Mr. Alex. Cohen and his 'Leeds Quartet' gave a good account, playing with an enthusiasm and sympathy that produced the best possible effect.

At their recital on December 3, Messrs. Edward Maude and Harold Mason played Sonatas by Beethoven (in F, Op. 24), Schumann (A minor), and Brahms (D minor). Miss Etty Ferguson was an interesting vocalist. Mr. Herbert Johnson is a pianist of unusual ability and enterprise, which were shown in a remarkable recital he gave on December 9, when he played a long succession of unfamiliar pieces by Lachner, Pachulski, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Evler, Cui, and Dupont, with Brahms's stupendous 'Paganini' variations as the central feature. It was a great undertaking, carried out with very marked success. A recital by Peckai and Miss Katherine Heymann formed Messrs. Haddock's musical evening on December 17.

OTHER TOWNS.

The Bradford Subscription Concert on November 22 was of peculiar excellence. Mr. Balling and the Hallé Orchestra gave a very fine performance of Brahms's third Symphony, and Mr. Eugen d'Albert was the soloist in Beethoven's great Pianoforte concerto in E flat. As he is perhaps the greatest living exponent of Beethoven's pianoforte music, his broad and sympathetic reading was no matter for surprise. The rest of the programme was of less account, but the two works already mentioned sufficed to give the concert distinction. The next concert of the series, on December 6, was a 'Melba Concert,' and calls for no criticism. On the following day the concert of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra was conducted by Mr. Fricker, of Leeds, who introduced two interesting works, which may fairly be described as novelties. Goldmark's 'Country wedding' Symphony has not often been heard in the provinces in the past twenty years, and it is quite interesting enough to repay revival. The second movement was omitted, but the other four proved exceedingly interesting, as did Glazounow's 'Carnaval' Overture, which was also new to these concerts. Mr. A. L. Camden played some bassoon solos in finished style, and Miss Carrie Tubb and Mr. Charlesworth George were the vocalists.

At Huddersfield the Glee and Madrigal Society, of which Mr. C. H. Moody is the conductor, gave a concert on December 3, when some unaccompanied part-music was well sung. Miss Phyllis Lett was the vocalist, and Mr. Fransella played several flute solos. The Huddersfield Philharmonic Society gave what was styled a 'Special Overture Night' on December 7, when Mr. Ibeson conducted creditable performances of Overtures by Mozart, Rossini, Suppé, and others. Mrs. Brearley played a portion of Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte concerto, and a young violinist, Mr. J. Butterworth, essayed Paganini's Concerto in D. Miss Amy Hinchliffe was the vocalist. The Subscription Concert on December 10 partook even more than usual of the character of a superior variety entertainment. Mr. Van Bieue appearing in the combined rôles of elocutionist and violoncellist, and two infant phenomena the pianist, Sigmund Feuermann, and the violinist, Solomon, taking a prominent part in the proceedings. Both are certainly very gifted children of whom we should hear more in the future.

The Halifax Choral Society, under Mr. Fricker's conductorship, gave an excellent all-round performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' on November 21. The soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Mr. Frank Mullings, Mr. Charles Tree, and Mr. Clement Shelldrake (Brander). On December 7, the Halifax Madrigal Society gave a concert which is referred to on p. 21. At the Halifax Chamber Concert, on December 12, the programme was supplied by the Leeds Trio, who were heard in Pianoforte trios by Schubert (in B flat), and Rachmaninoff.

Of the smaller concerts in the West Riding it may suffice to record that on November 25 the Pudsey Choral Union, under Mr. H. H. Pickard, gave 'St. Paul'; on December 10 the Batley Choral Society, of which Mr. John Fearnley is conductor, gave 'Judas Maccabæus,' and a fine performance of 'Elijah' was given by the Morley Choral Society, under Mr. Fricker, on December 11. The Keighley Orchestral Society's concert on December 4 included Haydn's 'Military' Symphony and some movements of Goldmark's 'Country wedding' Symphony. Mr. J. B. Summerscales conducted. At Ilkley a young pianist, Miss Ida Bellerby, gave a recital on December 2, and played with refinement and sympathy a Beethoven Sonata (in E, Op. 109), and pieces less familiar by MacDowell, and Sibelius. Miss Phyllis Lansdell sang, among other things, Mimi's solo from 'La Bohème' with quite exceptional charm.

At Hull the chief event of the month has been the visit of the Quinlan Opera Company on December 16-21, during which time they produced, among more familiar works, Charpentier's 'Louise' for the first time in Yorkshire. On December 6 the Hull Philharmonic Society gave a concert of more than ordinary interest, its chief feature being a highly creditable performance of Glazounow's C minor Symphony, under Mr. J. W. Hudson's direction. Liszt's 'Les Préludes' also found a place in the programme, and Miss Doris Carter was the vocalist. The concert took place in the recently-completed City Hall, in which Hull has a concert room that in spaciousness, beauty, and comfort excels any other in Yorkshire. A little more practical acquaintance with the conditions of concert-giving would have enabled the architect to plan the platform more conveniently, and it is to be regretted that this shortcoming mars the completeness of his success.

At York Miss Leila Willoughby, a young violinist who has recently been studying in St. Petersburg under Auer, showed her technical proficiency and artistic judgment in a recital on December 4, at which she played a Sonata of Tartini's with great breadth and warmth of tone. A quaint 'Orientale' by Cui, and a 'Burlesque' by Suk, were interesting novelties. On December 12, Brahms's 'German Requiem' was given in the Cathedral, with the assistance of the Leeds Parish Church Choir, Dr. Bairstow conducting, and Mr. Tertius Noble being at the organ. The general effect, amid such surroundings, was highly impressive. On December 14, the York Musical Society, under Mr. Noble, gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.' This same work, which is having a 'run' this season, was also given by the Doncaster Musical Society, under Mr. Wilfrid Sanderson, on November 22, when the principals were Miss Felissa, Miss Winifred Lewis, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Julien Henry.

At Scarborough, Mr. Hylton Stewart is giving a series of afternoon chamber concerts, and on December 5 Violin sonatas by Beethoven (in A, No. 2) and César Franck were played by Miss Leila Willoughby and Miss Eisele, who also contributed solos on their respective instruments. On December 9 the Scarborough Philharmonic Society, under Dr. Ely's conductorship, gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' followed by 'The Golden Legend,' of which report speaks very highly. The principals were Madame Anna Shergold, Miss Effie Martyn, Messrs. J. Collett and C. Morris. The choir of the Middlesbrough Musical Union were at their best in the familiar 'Elijah,' which was given on December 4 under Mr. Kilburn's direction. Mr. Herbert Brown was a satisfying Elijah, and the other principal parts were taken by Miss Eva Rich, Miss Maud Wright, and Mr. Joseph Reed.

RUGBY.—A spirited performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was given by the Rugby Philharmonic Society, at the Temple Rooms, on November 21. Full justice was done to the picturesque and delicate expressiveness of the work. Good solo singing was provided by Miss Gladys Moger, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. H. Eisdell, and Mr. David Brazell. The miscellaneous selections included the Gipsy chorus from Weber's 'Preciosa.' The Society has undertaken to perform Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion in the Spring.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.
Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—A performance of the 'Jena' Symphony helped to give distinction to the concert of the University Choral and Orchestral Society on December 10. Among the choral numbers in the programme were Coleridge-Taylor's 'A song of Proserpine,' Stanford's 'Plighted,' and Harold F. Simpson's 'My sweet sweeting.' Miss Nellie Donaldson sang a group of songs, of which some were by Professor Sanford Terry, the conductor.

ADELAIDE (S. AUSTRALIA).—The abilities of the Orpheus Choir were put to a searching test on October 23 in a programme that included Brahms's 'Marching,' Lee Williams's 'To Celia,' Hegar's 'Walpurga,' and Elgar's 'Songs from the Greek Anthology.' Full justice was done to this varied music under the direction of Mr. E. A. Daltry. The soloists of the concert were Mrs. A. T. Brainsby, Mr. F. Mills Rogers, Mr. W. Francis Noffke, and Mr. W. S. Deane (vocalists), and Mr. Wilfrid Arlom (pianist).

ANDOVER.—The newly-formed Choral Society opened its season on December 4 with an excellent performance of Sterndale Bennett's 'The May Queen,' under the able direction of Mr. Julian Farmer, organist and choirmaster of St. Mary's, Andover. The solo-singers were Miss Elsie Cockings, Miss May Peters, Mr. Franklin Taylor, and Mr. E. J. Whitam, all of whom took part in the miscellaneous portion of the programme. The choir and orchestra numbered eighty performers.

BERKHAMSTED School.—At the Christmas concert, which was given on December 14, a spirited and successful performance of Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Ballad of the Clampheddown' was given by the choir and orchestra of one hundred and fifty performers under the conductorship of Mr. J. T. Bavin. Other items in a very successful programme were the madrigals 'All creatures now are merry-minded' (Benet), and 'Now is the month of Maying' (Morley), Rossini's Overture to 'William Tell,' a movement from Sterndale Bennett's Pianoforte concerto in F, and Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance,' No. 1. Among the solos a selection from Terry's recently published 'Old rhymes with new tunes' was exceedingly well received, and Debussy's 'Arabesque' (No. 1) and Wieniawski's 'Légende' were well played by two of the boys.

BLACKBURN.—The wealth of voice and width of interpretative ability possessed by the Blackburn Ladies' Choir were employed to good use on December 4 in a programme that included G. von Holst's 'Tears, idle tears,' Wolstenholme's 'The sorrows of Werther' (dedicated to the choir), Elgar's 'Fly, singing bird' and 'The snow,' and Frederick Corder's 'The rain' and 'The sunshine.' Mr. F. Duckworth, the hon. conductor, secured results worthy of the reputation of the choir. Solo music was given by Mrs. John Taylor and Mr. Cuthbertson Orr (vocalists), Mrs. Briggs (pianist), and Mr. J. Tomlinson (violinist).

CHELMSFORD.—Mr. Frye's Choral Society gave their first concert of the season on November 25 at the Shire Hall. The choir sang part-songs, folk-songs, and madrigals, including German's 'My bonny lass, she smileth,' Pointer's 'When all the world is young,' Bateson's 'Camella fair,' and Wilbye's 'Sweet honey-sucking bees.' Two string quartets—Beethoven's in C minor (Op. 18, No. 4) and Haydn's 'Emperor'—were played by Messrs. G. H. and E. R. Wilby, W. Smith, and Tennyson Werge. Miss Euneta Truscott was the vocalist. Mr. Frye was conductor and accompanist.

CHRISTCHURCH (N.Z.).—On October 3, Mr. W. S. King conducted a miscellaneous concert given by the Musical Union before a large and enthusiastic audience. Stanford's 'The last post,' Blumenthal's 'Shadow,' and the 'Chorus of Houris' from Schumann's 'Paradise and the Peri,' were the chief numbers in which the choir took part. A number of orchestral pieces were played, and interesting solo contributions were given, the latter including the Adagio from Mozart's Clarinet concerto.

DRIFFIELD.—The annual Christmas Concert of the Driffield Choral Society took place at the Temperance Hall on December 3, when the concert edition of Gounod's 'Faust' was splendidly performed. The audience was large and enthusiastic, and frequently expressed approval of the work of both choir and soloists. The latter were Miss L. Dillingham, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop, all of whom also contributed to the miscellaneous portion of the programme. The choir and orchestra numbered over 100, and were under the direction of Mr. W. G. Peake. The Spring Concert is arranged for Tuesday, April 1, when Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis Night' will be the chief feature.

FARNHAM.—The Musical Society (assisted by members of the Alton Choral Society) and the Instrumental Society gave a highly successful concert on December 10 with Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Hiller's 'A song of victory' as the chief numbers in the programme. Sullivan's 'O gladsome Light' and German's 'My bonnie lass' were also sung. The solo singers of the occasion were Miss Maud Willby and Mr. F. Ernest Osborne, and the conductors were Miss Lushington (representing the Alton Choral Society) and Mr. Percy R. Rowe.

FAVERSHAM.—The chief work in the programme of the Faversham Institute Philharmonic Society's concert of December 5 was Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' which was creditably performed under the direction of Mr. W. J. Keech. The programme also included Fanning's 'Song of the Vikings,' orchestral selections, and songs given by Miss Clytie Hine and Mr. Malcolm Boyle.

FOLKESTONE.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was performed on November 27 at a successful concert given by the Folkestone Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. F. E. Fletcher. Both the choir and the soloists, Miss Leah Felissa, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. David Brazell, put enthusiasm into their work, and the orchestra gave efficient support.

HOBBART (TASMANIA).—The opening concert of the thirty-ninth season was given by the Orpheus Club in the Town Hall on November 4, before a crowded audience, among whom were Lady Barron and suite. The Club sang part-songs, &c., among which 'The patriot' (Lloyd), 'Love reigneth over all' (Elasser), and 'Eventide' (Robinson) were their best efforts. The various gradations of tone were most artistically treated, and at the close of the concert Lady Barron complimented the conductor (Mr. P. Planche-Plummer) upon the excellent results achieved. Mrs. Nina Phillips, Miss Eva Creese, and Mr. J. R. Betts assisted, and two of the Club members, Mr. C. Stanway and Mr. Owen Tudor, also contributed to a most enjoyable and successful programme. Miss Mary Corvan played the accompaniments.

HYTHE.—The Choral Society gave the first concert of their tenth season on November 20, when Schumann's 'Manfred' and Stanford's 'Revenge' were performed. The recitations in the former were given by the Vicar of Hythe. Miss M. Noverre was principal violin, and Dr. A. T. Froggatt conducted.

KING'S LYNN.—The Musical Society gave the first concert of their season on December 4 with every success under the direction of Mr. W. J. Conley. The chief feature of the programme was the concert version of Gounod's 'Faust,' comprising the three most popular choral numbers and solos for Siebel and Margarita (Miss Emily Shepherd), Faust (Mr. James Hay), and Mephistopheles (Mr. Norman Williams). The choral singing was attractive in tone and manner, both in Gounod's music and in the miscellaneous numbers, which consisted of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Encinctured with a twine of leaves' (female voices) and 'Whispers of Summer,' and Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages.'

LEICESTER.—The complete cycle of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was performed at the Temperance Hall on December 12, by the New Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. Charles Hancock. Excellent tone and expressive meaning distinguished the choral singing, which was well appreciated. The solo parts were taken by Madame Gleeson-White, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Hamilton Harris.

LETTERHEAD.—At the concert of the Royal School for the Blind, given on December 7, the choral numbers included Luard-Selby's 'The Fakenham ghost,' Benet's 'All creatures now are merry-minded,' Booth's 'Hymn to the moon,' Liza Lehmann's 'When icicles hang by the wall,' Leslie's trio, 'O memory,' and H. S. Robertson's arrangement of 'King Arthur.'

LONG BUCKEY.—Gade's cantata 'The Erl-King's Daughter' was performed with good effect by the Choral Society on December 12, under Mr. R. W. Strickland. The programme of the concert also included Webbe's glee, 'When winds breathe soft,' and Buck's 'Hymn to Music.'

LUTON.—Sullivan's 'The Prodigal Son' was the programme of the concert given on November 27, under the conductorship of Mr. F. Gostelow. The solos were undertaken by Miss Gladys Honey, Miss May Peters, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. Charles Knowles.

PETERBOROUGH.—'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and 'The death of Minnehaha,' the latter of which was new to Peterborough, were performed by the Choral Union on December 3, under the direction of Mr. A. E. Armstrong. An excellent standard was achieved in the choral singing and maintained in the work of the soloists, Miss C. Shrive, Mr. George Foxon, and Mr. J. B. Smith. Equally successful was the performance of Bridge's 'Ballad of the Clampheddown,' which followed. The orchestra gave good assistance. On December 10, the Orchestral Society of over sixty players, all amateurs resident in the district, gave a concert with Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, which was very creditably played, as the chief work in the programme. Miss Elsie Morris played Schumann's Pianoforte concerto, a new 'Orchestral waltz' by Mr. Douglas Baker was produced, and solos were given by Miss S. E. Vergette, Mr. H. E. Noble (vocalists), and Mr. W. T. Wilson (viola). Dr. H. Keeton and Mr. A. E. Armstrong conducted.

PORST ELIZABETH.—Under the auspices of the Deutsche Liedertafel Mr. Ascham gave, on October 22, a recital of pianoforte compositions by Liszt, the chief examples being the 'Funeral March' and the Sonata in B minor.

READING.—Dr. J. B. Hurry, to whom Reading is indebted for several memorials in connection with its famous Abbey, has offered to place in the Chapter House a tablet to commemorate the association of the part-song, 'Sumer is iumen in,' with the Abbey.

WATFORD.—The opening movement of Beethoven's C major Pianoforte concerto, with Miss Stella Williams as soloist, was the most considerable item in the work of Mr. Victor Duane's Senior Orchestra at the concert given on December 4. Beethoven's Romance in G major was also given by Master Cyril Pratt, with the orchestra. The programme included a Handel 'Concerto Grosso,' and songs were given by Mr. Ewart Best. The concert opened with a short selection contributed by the Junior Orchestra.

WOKING.—The programme of the first concert of the season given by the Woking Musical Society, which took place at the Public Hall on December 10, consisted of a miscellaneous selection (in the course of which the orchestra played Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' Overture and Miss Annette Tilbury gave Mozart's Violin concerto in A minor) and of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.' This was performed to universal satisfaction, the choral tone being of good quality and the attack spirited. The solo parts were given by Mrs. Howard Fawcett, Miss Helen Blain, Mr. Herbert Tracey, and Mr. Gwilym Richards. The orchestra and choir were conducted by Mr. Patrick White.

WORCESTER.—Elgar's 'The Music Makers' has been promptly taken up, after its Birmingham success, by the Worcester Festival Choral Society, who performed it, under the direction of Mr. Ivor Atkins, at the Public Hall on November 19. The choral singers were inspired by Elgar's music to summon their highest powers of expression and vocal beauty, and a deep impression was made by both the work and its interpretation. The contralto soloist was Miss Sara Silvers, who contributed to the programme

'The Virgin's lullaby,' by Mr. Atkins, and other songs. The remainder of the programme consisted of the Vorspiel to 'Tristan und Isolde' and 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' in which the tenor solo was taken by Mr. Wilbur Reed.—'A tale of Old Japan' was given by the Worcester Musical Society on December 10, with excellent effect, under the direction of Mr. W. Mann Dyson, who was the recipient, during the evening, of a handsome presentation. The soloists in the cantata were Madame Laura Taylor, Miss Gertrude Evers, Mr. W. J. Outley, and the Rev. A. L. E. Griffiths. Eaton Fanning's 'The Vikings' terminated a varied programme.

Foreign Notes.

AMSTERDAM.

Among the most interesting of recent events has been the production of Jan Ingenhoven's new Quintet for wind instruments.

ANTWERP.

Frank von der Stucken's Festival Prologue 'Pax triumphans' has been played under the composer's direction with great success.—An interesting overture, 'Cyrano de Bergerac,' by J. Wagenaar, was heard at the first of the Nouveaux Concerts. On the same occasion the Misses May and Beatrice Harrison played Brahms's double Concerto with great success.—Wilhelm Kienzl's opera 'Alpenlied' (Kuhreigen) was mounted for the first time at the Flemish Opera. Shortly after this J. Broeck's 'Studentenliede' was successfully produced.

BARCELONA.

The National Congress for Sacred Music was very well attended and proved of considerable interest. In addition to the lectures, several concerts were given. Among the outstanding features of the programmes were performances of Cabezon's Variations for organ (said to be the most ancient known) and of Palestrina's 'Missa Papæ Marcelli.'

BERLIN.

Boëhe's Tone-poem 'Taormina' was successfully performed under the composer's direction, at a concert given at the Blüthner Saal.—A magnificent Sonata for violin, viola da gamba, and cembalo by Buxtehude figured in the programme of a concert of the 'Deutsche Vereinigung für alte Musik.'—The Bohemian Quartet have played a String quartet by Josef Suk for the first time.—Delius's Symphonic-poem 'Lebensstanz' was produced at the second Symphony Concert under Herr Oscar Fried.—The Hungarian Quartet played Maurice Ravel's String quartet in F major for the first time in Berlin.—Robert Kahn's new String quartet in F major was produced by the Klingler Quartet.—The famous Philharmonic Choir has at last included Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion in its repertoire, and recently gave the work without cuts at two performances in one day. The critics generally agree that the omissions usually made are advantageous.—Haydn's rarely-heard oratorio 'Tobias Heimkehr' has been revived by the Charlottenburger Bürgerchor.—The Neuköllner Oratorienverein have sung Handel's 'Samson.'—The concerts given by Madame Clara Butt and Mr. Kennerley Rumford were very successful.—Interesting Violin sonatas by Sinding and Paderewski were in the programme given by Miss Tawrowsky and Herr Heinrich Maurer.—Two cantatas by Bach, 'Wachet auf ruft uns die Stimme' and 'O Jesu Christ, mein Lebens Licht,' and Brahms's 'Requiem' formed the programme at a concert of the Singakademie (conductor, Professor Georg Schumann).—Under the direction of Herr Alexander Weinbaum the Neue Oratorienchor gave a fine performance of Dvorák's beautiful 'Requiem' (Op. 89).—Herr Sigfrid Karg-Elert recently gave an interesting concert of his own compositions. The programme included a Sonata for harmonium, culminating in a Fantasy and double Fugue on the name B-a-c-h, a Sonata for violin solo, the Pianoforte sonata in F sharp minor, and a number of fine songs.—Heinrich Zoellner's second Symphony (Op. 100) and 'Drei Stimmungsbilder,' by M. Krohn, figured in the programme of an orchestral concert given by Herr Wilhelm König.—At the Royal Opera the famous Italian baritone, Mattia Battistini, appeared with great success in Verdi's 'Maskenball' and 'Rigoletto.'—Lortzing's delightful opera 'Zar und Zimmermann' was revived at the Deutsches Opernhaus.

BREMEN.

An interesting Pianoforte quintet by Mraczek was produced by Professor Bromberger and the Philharmonic Quartet.

BRUNSWICK.

Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was recently performed for the first time at the Court Theatre.

BRUSSELS.

M. Leon Dubois has been appointed director of the Conservatoire in succession to the late M. Edgar Tinel. M. Eugen Ysaye has been created maître de Chapelle du Roi.—The dramatic legend, 'La chant de la Cloche,' by Vincent d'Indy (who has himself furnished the libretto, an adaptation of Schiller's 'Das Lied von der Glocke'), was produced on November 21 at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie.

CASSEL.

Siegfried Wagner's opera 'Der Kobold' has been played for the first time at the Court Theatre.

COLOGNE.

Hans Huber's Symphony in A major was performed for the first time at the third Gürzenich concert (conductor, Herr Fritz Steinbach).—Under the conductorship of Herr Gustav Brecher, Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was given at the Municipal Theatre.

COPENHAGEN.

August Enna's three-act opera 'Nattergalen' (after Hans Andersen's fairy tale 'The nightingale') was successfully produced at the Royal Theatre.

DARMSTADT.

Weber's comic opera 'Die drei Pintos' (as edited by Gustav Mahler) has been revived at the Court Theatre.

DRESDEN.

Under the direction of Herr von Schuch, Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was mounted for the first time at the Royal Opera. The work, though considerably better performed than at Stuttgart, failed to create genuine enthusiasm. The majority of critics agree in their disapproval of Herr Hugo von Hofmannsthal's version of Molière's comedy.

DÜSSELDORF.

Under the direction of Professor Karl Panzner, the cantata 'Macht hoch die Tür,' by Weisman, was produced at the second concert of the Städtischer Musikverein.—Wolf-Ferrari's opera 'Der Schmuck der Madonna' was recently given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre. Shortly afterwards, Alfred Kaiser's opera 'Theodor Körner' was produced.

CHEMNITZ.

Max Reger's five-part motet, 'O Tod, wie bitter bist du,' and two motets, 'Der Tod' and 'Mein Odem ist schwach,' by Rudolph Berg, were performed at the twenty-sixth concert at the Lucasikirche.

FREIBURG.

The second concert of the Municipal Orchestra (conductor, Herr Munter) was devoted to French music, the programme including Theodore Dubois's Violin concerto (soloist, M. Henri Marteau), a Suite for violin and orchestra by Henri Marteau, Ravel's 'Rhapsodie espagnole,' and Orchestral Variations by Vincent d'Indy.

GENEVA.

Stavenghagen's new second Pianoforte concerto was recently produced with success at one of the Subscription Symphony Concerts.

THE HAGUE.

The second Symphony Concert, conducted by M. Mengelberg, was devoted to compositions by Scriabine, the programme including the first Symphony, the Pianoforte concerto (with the composer as soloist), and the extraordinary 'Prométhée, le poème du feu.'

HAMBURG.

Mahler's 'Das Lied von der Erde' was given at a Philharmonic Concert, under the direction of Herr Siegmund von Hausegger.—An interesting Symphonic-poem, 'Griselidis,' by Richard Mandl, was performed at the second Symphony Concert, conducted by Herr José Eibenschütz.

HANOVER.

At the second Symphony Concert of the Königliche Kapelle (conductor, Herr Karl Gille) the Symphonic-ode 'Frühling,' for choir and orchestra, by Richard Metzdorf, was given for the first time. The programme also contained fragments of Siegfried Wagner's opera 'Banadietrich.'

KIEL.

Wagner's opera 'Rienzi' has been revived at the Municipal Theatre.—Three cantatas by Bach, 'Bleib bei uns, denn es will Abend werden,' 'Halt im Gedächtnis Jesum Christ,' and 'Gott der Herr ist Sonn und Schild,' were sung at a recent concert of the A Cappella Chor.

LEIPSIK.

An early Symphony, No. 2, B flat major, by Schubert was heard at the second concert of the Musikalische Gesellschaft (conductor, Herr Georg Göhler).—Two works by Reger, 'Die Weihe der Nacht,' for alto solo, male chorus, and orchestra, and 'An die Hoffnung,' for alto solo and orchestra, were sung for the first time at a concert of the Neue Leipziger Männerchor.—A new comic opera, 'Der Schneider von Malta,' composed by Waldemar Wendland to the libretto by Richard Schott, was successfully produced at the Neues Theater on November 17.

LYONS.

Massenet's opera, 'Don Quichotte,' and Jan Blockx's ballet, 'Milenka,' have been given for the first time at the Grand Theatre.

MAGDEBURG.

The Reblingsche Gesangverein (conductor, Professor Kauffmann) gave a fine performance of Felix Woyrsch's 'Totentanz.'—Weingartner's 'Lustige Overture' was performed at the second Theaterconcert.—Carl Loewe's oratorio, 'Das Sühnopfer des neuen Bundes' was revived by the Donchor.

MANNHEIM.

The third concert of the Musikalische Akademie was conducted by Weingartner, who secured a magnificent performance of his own third Symphony in E major.—Jean Louis Nicodé's Symphonic-ode 'Das Meer' was given at a concert of the Lehrgesangverein.

MILAN.

Richard Strauss's 'Feuersnot' ('I fuochi di San Giovanni') was recently performed at the Scala Theatre for the first time in Italy. On the same occasion his opera 'Salome' was also given.—Leoncavallo's opera 'Gli Zingari' (composed for the London Hippodrome) was played for the first time at the Teatro Lirico with considerable success.—On November 7 Ezio Camussi's three-act opera 'La Dubarry' was produced.—On November 14 Ricardo Zandonai's new opera 'Melenis' was produced at the Teatro dal Verme with considerable success.

MONTREUX (SWITZERLAND).

The annual benefit concert given on November 14 for the musicians of the orchestra of the Kursaal was rendered especially interesting by the performance of Templeton Strong's symphony 'Sintram.' This—the composer's second Symphony—was produced at New York by Anton Seidl in 1894, and after very successful performances several times in America, seems to have been forgotten till it was played in February this year at the Symphony Concerts at Lausanne. At Montreux, under the baton of the new conductor, M. Ernest Ansermet, it was excellently played, and made a deep impression, being received with great enthusiasm.

NORDHAUSEN.

The second Philharmonic Concert was devoted to compositions by Hugo Kaun, the programme including the D minor Symphony, Op. 22, a Symphonic-poem, 'Am Rhein,' four pieces for small orchestra, Op. 70, a Fantasiestück for violin and orchestra, and a number of songs.

PARIS.

Theodore Dubois's second Symphony and Schumann's 'Manfred' music were included in the programme of the Colonne Concert given on November 10.—On November 18, a new spectacular opera in three acts, 'L'Aigle,' composed by Jean Nougoué to the libretto by Messrs. Henri Cain and Louis Payen, was produced at the Théâtre-Lyrique de la Gaité.—The programme of the Conservatoire Concert, given on November 24, contained Ernest Chausson's 'Hymne Védique' and Gabriel Fauré's Suite, 'Pelléas et Mélisande.'—'La chasse du Prince Arthur,' by Guy Ropartz, was played at a Lamoureux Concert.—Lecocq's delightful operetta, 'Le petit duc,' has been revived at the Théâtre-Lyrique de la Gaité.

PHILADELPHIA.

Goldmark's opera, 'Heimchen am Herd,' was recently given at the Opera House.

PRAGUE.

Richard Strauss's 'Feuersnot' has been given for the first time at the Czech National Theatre with great success. Beethoven's ballet, 'Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus,' was revived at the same theatre.

ROME.

Among the novelties to be performed at the Costanzi Theatre are 'The legend of the seven towers,' by Alberto Gasco; Mascagni's 'Isabeau'; 'Arabesca,' by Monteleone; 'Phaedra,' by Hildebrand Pizzetti; Richard Strauss's 'Feuersnot,' and 'Melenis,' by Zandonai.—Armand Marsick's opera, 'La vendetta Corse,' was recently produced at the Teatro Adriano.

SOLINGEN.

Bach's cantatas, 'Du Hirte Israel höre,' 'Jauchset Gott in allen Landen,' 'Mer bahn en neue Oberkeet,' the third 'Brandenburg' Concerto, the Overture in D major (No. 3), the Concerto for two pianofortes and orchestra, and the Concerto for two violins, formed the programme of the first concert of the Städtischer Gesangverein.

STOCKHOLM.

Madame Teresa Carreño, Messrs. Busoni, Humperdinck, Georg Hüttner, Max von Schillings, and Sgambati have been elected members of the Swedish Academy.

VIENNA.

Eugen d'Albert's newest opera, 'Liebesketten,' has been very successfully produced at the Volksoper. The composer, who was present, was accorded a cordial ovation.

Miscellaneous.

A preliminary meeting was held in June last, to consider the advisability of forming the 'Artists' Guild,' an organization on a religious basis to include both men and women, 'whose main work is any branch of Art.' At St. Paul's Chapter House, on November 8, a number of musicians, painters, and craftsmen assembled and formed this Guild. The Bishop of Winchester was elected president. Mr. Walter Ford, who was in the chair, gave an address which set forth the object of the Guild. He said: There were many religious people who had no belief in Art, there were more artists who had no belief in religion. Those present on this occasion were able to believe in both. The Guild of Artists felt that it was truer wisdom to start as a smaller body with strong principles than as a larger body with weak ones. So it had been decided that the nucleus of the Guild should be composed only of those who belonged to some body in communion with the See of Canterbury, and who could conscientiously subscribe to their rules. But it was open to them to welcome cordially, as associates, all those whose conscience prevented them from subscribing to more than the general expression of the purpose of the Guild, which was 'to unite in a common Bond of Fellowship those who desired to consecrate their gifts to the Glory of God.' The Guild sought to unite in a common society those artists who believed in the Christian Faith, and who found in it an inspiration for their life and for their art. The hon. secretary, Miss M. C. M. Bergman, 107, Goldhurst Terrace, South Hampstead, would be pleased to forward particulars to anyone wishing for them.

A lecture on Welsh Folk-song, with illustrations, was given by Mr. A. George at Zion Congregational Church, Cae'dpaeth, on November 27.

Answers to Correspondents.

H. D. R.—Our report (October, 1867), of the Birmingham Festival of that year does not specifically state that Gounod's 'Messe Solonelle' in G was performed then for the first time in England, but seems to imply it. According to the Prod'homme-Dandelot book, the 'Messe Solonelle de Sant Cécile' was first performed on August 29, 1855, having been composed during that year. Perhaps this refers to the completion of it.

A. H.—The article you refer to was published in our issue for December, 1900, which is obtainable. It gave a list of Sullivan's chief works, and their dates. A fuller list is given in B. W. Findon's 'Sir Arthur Sullivan' (James Nisbet, 21, Berners Street; price 3s. 6d.).

ROY.—Procure typewritten copies of your verses, with the word 'Copyright' at the top, and send them, with stamped addressed envelope, to all likely composers whose addresses you find in the Musical Directory (Rudall Carte, 23, Berners Street; price 3s.).

REMARKABLE WORK

ON

MUSIC EDUCATION.

WRITTEN BY FAMOUS EXPERTS.

THAT Wonderful Book, the MUSICAL EDUCATOR, seems this season to be entering upon a new lease of life. As our readers know, its aim is to supply in interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

PADEREWSKI,

"On the best way to study the Piano."

MARK HAMBOURG,

"The Piano and how to Play it."

CARUSO,

"On the cultivation of the voice."

CLARA BUTT,

"On how to sing a song."

EDWIN H. LEMARE,

"The Art of Organ Playing."

MADAME MARCHESI,

"The Teaching of Singing."

JOHN DUNN,

"On Playing the Violin."

SIR F. H. COWEN,

"The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeccio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.

"'The Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent."

Dr. CRESER, Mus.D. Oxon, F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader."

... It contains excellent instructions."

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, The Royal College of Organists, and The College of Preceptors. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University, the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

BENEDICITE, OMNIA OPERA. Adapted and set to music by PERCY J. VINCENT. Price 3d. As sung at British Embassy Church, Paris. London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

["No English-speaking country or colony with so much as a solitary musical society is unacquainted with the music of Mr. Gaul."—Birmingham Daily Gazette and Express, April 11, 1910.]

MR. GAUL will be pleased to forward to the Colonies or any foreign country the Orchestral Parts (on loan) of any of his works.

COMPOSITIONS BY ALFRED R. GAUL

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SECOND THOUSAND.

1. THE HOLY CITY. A SACRED CANTATA FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

2. THE TEN VIRGINS A SACRED CANTATA FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."

—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.
"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."

—The Musical Times.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

Produced with great success by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. FORTY-FIRST TO FORTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

3. JOAN OF ARC AN HISTORICAL CANTATA FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."—The Western News.
"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. TWENTY-FOURTH THOUSAND.

4. PASSION SERVICE (Only published in Vocal Score) FOR THE SEASON OF LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are, respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Mr. Gaul's work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his already high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

Arranged for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

5. THE PRINCE OF PEACE A SACRED CANTATA FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneity, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . . Worthy the study of Choral Societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment."—Pontypool Free Press.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

6. ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS A SACRED CANTATA FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

(Only published in Staff Notation and Tonic Sol-fa.)

"We welcome 'Israel in the Wilderness' as one of those works which foster the love and induce the practice of music amongst the people."—Musical Standard.

"The Cantata contains all the elements of popularity, and it was excellently performed under the composer's direction, and very warmly received."—Standard.

"Effective without presenting any overwhelming difficulties. The part-writing is excellent. . . . Melodious throughout."—Daily News.

"Likely to become quite as great a favourite with choral societies as 'The Holy City.'"—Daily Chronicle.

"Altogether worthy of the composer of that amazingly popular work, 'The Holy City.'"—The Referee.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. NINTH THOUSAND.

7. UNA CANTATA FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious, tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added."—Athenaeum.

"Choral societies have long shown that Mr. Gaul is a composer whom they are glad to accept. 'Una' will find its way amongst them easily."—Daily Telegraph.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. SIXTY-FIFTH THOUSAND.

Revised Edition, including an INTERMEZZO or SLOW DANCE to follow the Wedding Chorus.

Performed in the Town Hall, Birmingham, on twenty occasions.

8. RUTH A PASTORAL CANTATA SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP OR FOR CONCERT PURPOSES.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s.; ditto, paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 4s.

The Chorus (only in Vocal Score, for Musical Societies, paper cover, 1s. Words, 5s. per 100.

THE MUSIC MAKERS

ODE

BY

ARTHUR O'SHAUGHNESSY

SET TO MUSIC

FOR CONTRALTO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

EDWARD ELGAR

(Op. 69).

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Paper Boards, 3s.; Cloth, 4s.; Vocal Parts, 1s. each; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. 6d.
String Parts, 9s.; Wind Parts and Full Score (on hire).

THE TIMES.

It is a setting of the Ode by Arthur O'Shaughnessy beginning "We are the music makers, and we are the dreamers of dreams," which extols the artist spirit as the motive power of human action. The words are of a kind to appeal markedly to such a mind as Elgar's and to bring from him music which makes a very direct appeal to the sympathy of his audience. The personal interpretation of the words given by the frequent quotations from his own earlier works no doubt heightens this appeal at the moment, and serves to secure an immediate acceptance for the work.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The music is often of exquisite beauty, . . . The Ode represents Elgar in the highest development of his creative faculty.

MORNING POST.

To illustrate the story of those who have inspired the music the composer draws from his own works, his quotations from himself being made with considerable subtlety. As in the case of a play founded upon a novel, it is necessary to know the original to appreciate its application, but as Elgar's music is now well known there is no difficulty on the part of the hearers. . . . The use made of familiar themes is happy, but nowhere is it so successfully made as at that portion where the soloist enters to describe the ignorance of the singers as to the effect of their work. Here the theme of the Nimrod number from the Enigma Variations is used, and, as reinforced by the chorus, the effect is very striking. Though using recognisable matter, the composer employs it in the best manner, and he works this section up to a mighty climax.

DAILY NEWS.

The whole is full of characteristic Elgarian beauty and ample contrasts. It is more easily intelligible at a first hearing than any of his important recent works, and its instant popularity would seem to be assured.

DAILY EXPRESS.

There is not a great deal of music, melodically speaking, in the swing of the lines, and after writing one wholly beautiful theme—a theme that is constantly recurring, if never with quite the same alluring appeal as when it is first heard in the orchestra—the composer continues on his way with a wealth of harmonic colour and forceful rhetoric.

DAILY MAIL.

"The Music Makers," Sir Edward Elgar's new choral ode, touches none of the depths of the composer's really memorable achievements excepting by the way of direct quotation. Yet it deserves, and will win, popular favour and many performances because of its fluent grace and beautifully accomplished workmanship.

Sir Edward Elgar is nowadays in the completest possession of his style of technical accomplishments. He can compose those glowing Elgarian harmonies, that rich orchestral colouring, whether he has or has not a considerable motive behind, just as Bach wrote counterpoint.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The brief prelude is full of that mystic atmosphere which Elgar knows so well how to produce, and the hushed entry of the chorus in some simple phrases is also very exquisite in effect. Then I think the music flags just a little until we come to a passage where the chorus sings (in ancient mode) of Nineveh, and the orchestra has a fine theme of swinging rhythm, suggesting an irresistible onward force.

Some of the finest music in the work begins with the entry of a contralto solo, "They had no vision amazing," sung to phrases of much imagination. . . . A fine climax, picturing "the infinite morning," is fashioned out of the big theme of the first Symphony, and soon the contralto voice enters again with a long solo of great emotional power and beauty. The ending brings once more the hushed mystic atmosphere with which the work opened.

FIFINE AT THE FAIR

(A DEFENCE OF INCONSTANCY).

AN ORCHESTRAL DRAMA

WITH A PROLOGUE

(AFTER BROWNING).

COMPOSED BY

GRANVILLE BANTOCK.

MINIATURE SCORE.

Price Five Shillings. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

Orchestral Parts, MS.

THE TIMES.

It is indeed a remarkably brilliant piece of work of its kind, and is one which it is easy to appreciate. . . . We have first a delicate prologue for strings which directly pictures the sensations described in Browning's "Amphibian," then a delightfully humorous scene of the Fair, then music intended to contrast the characters of Fifine and Elvire. . . . He never seems at a loss for a moment, and if his drama is apt to call up recollections of modern Italian opera, all the devices serve him well, because they convey certain ideas in a direct way to his audience.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Superbly put together, and invented and scored by a truly masterly hand, Bantock has not given us for many days a work so likely to bring worshippers to the shrine of his great and here genial talent.

STANDARD.

Mr. Granville Bantock's musical counterpart to Browning's "Fifine at the Fair" is quite the best thing that he has given us. He is never at a loss for a happy phrase, never nonplussed for want of right shade of colour. His music is realistic—splendidly and convincingly so in the Fair scene—objective and subjective; picturesque, sensuous and strong. In the more introspective passages his instruments moralise with singular eloquence. The clash of emotion—there is no need to dwell upon the cause, since Browning is an open book to all—is handled with masterly effect. . . . It is delightful music, and good hearing from beginning to end.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Bantock's orchestral drama, "Fifine at the Fair," is a brilliant contribution to English orchestral literature, original and modern in its ideas and masterly in its orchestral treatment of these. The music is founded upon Browning's poem of the same name, and is divided into a prologue, drama, and epilogue (as in the poem). The first section has given Mr. Bantock an opportunity for his fine powers of musical characterization, and the themes illustrating the nature of the three protagonists (Fifine, the Man, and his wife, Gloire) are very expressive and cleverly handled. The drama opens with a clever tone-picture of the Fair, which is almost one of the best things in the work, this being followed by a "Fifine portrait" of much cleverness. The epilogue music perhaps attracts one more by its cleverness than its inspiration, but here, too, the composer has written some pages glowing with a fine emotion and of much dramatic power.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Granville Bantock's orchestral drama, "Fifine," is a very brilliant and spirited piece of work, and in many ways stronger than any other work of the same class by Bantock.

YORKSHIRE POST.

No living musician has a greater power of orchestral expression, and his poetic fancy is inexhaustible. Never has it been employed on a more charming subject or with better effect than in this case. He has produced a work which will compare with the symphonic poems of Strauss, and will be regarded by most people as more uniformly musical. It is not going too far to style it a masterly work, and entirely successful. It gives us the composer's own impressions of the drama it illustrates in absolutely musical terms. It glows with colour; it is brilliant, atmospheric, passionate, in turn; and it is also thoroughly spontaneous and unaffected.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

In his orchestral drama, "Fifine at the Fair," Professor Granville Bantock has far surpassed all his previous achievements in orchestral music, and attempts not without success the scope of Strauss.

OBSERVER.

Professor Granville Bantock's "Fifine at the Fair," which is inspired by Browning's poem, is, taken as a whole, perhaps the strongest and best-proportioned of all the composer's symphonic works, and the fullest of real feeling, while the themes are the most expressive he has given us. . . . The way in which they are used, so as to represent the interplay of forces between the three chief characters, and the genuine power and beauty of much of the orchestral writing, make the work exceedingly good to hear.

SUNDAY TIMES.

He has succeeded in giving us a very picturesque and coherent Symphonic Poem, which is better worth listening to than almost anything from his pen.

ODE ON THE NATIVITY

THE WORDS BY

WILLIAM DUNBAR

SET TO MUSIC

FOR SOPRANO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

C. HUBERT H. PARRY.

Price Two Shillings.

Paper Boards, 2s. 6d. Cloth, 4s.

String Parts, 7s. (In the Press); Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

THE TIMES.

It is a very happy work, full of a fresh, strong spirit of joyfulness. It opens with a simple pastoral theme which sets the tone of the whole and puts one in the presence of a strong personality brimming over with vitality. The swinging phrases of the "Rorate coeli desuper" begun by the soprano solo and taken up by the choir carry on the feeling and throughout the Ode is continuously woven out of these and similar materials. There is majesty in the call to the heavenly powers—"archangels, angels, and dominations"—to worship the Saviour, intimate tenderness in the appeal of the soprano solo, "Sinners, be glad and penance do," and the later stanzas calling upon all Nature in turn are touched with delightful suggestions of poetic feeling.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Sir Hubert Parry has given us a legitimate successor to "The Blessed Pair of Sirens." . . . Dunbar's poem consists of six stanzas, each followed by the refrain "Et nobis Puer natus est," or nearly so. A lovely pastoral movement opens the cantata. . . . We have no composer, and have had none in the memory of living man, who could so well have extracted the liveliness from Dunbar's verses as Parry, none who could have maintained as well as struck the true note of healthy geniality, and maintained it so homogeneously, none who could have done this with a more marked individuality. . . . There is much that is beautiful for the soprano soloist, on this occasion Miss Ada Forrest, but nothing so lovely as the appeal to sinners to be glad unless it is the sublime glorioseness of the refrain of the fifth stanza and the superb sound of the chorus work in the final—a passage well worthy to rank with the famous close of Milton's Ode referred to at the beginning of this notice. . . . We are likely to hear far more of the Ode than of any of the immediately previous compositions by Sir Hubert Parry, and I, for one, will gladly be among the listeners whensoever called upon, for it is a work of sublime loftiness, of joyous feeling.

STANDARD.

It is difficult to decide which to admire more, the fidelity with which the composer repeatedly selects the same method to express his thoughts, or the ease with which he develops his subject and elaborates his contrapuntal themes. . . . There is some good eight-part writing, and the music for the double chorus in the final section is of characteristic strength and fibre, and ultimately develops into a powerful climax, which gives place to a serene treatment of "Pro nobis puer natus est," the refrain of the poem.

MORNING POST.

There is nothing complicated or diffuse in the music. The simple design adopted shows the hand of experience. Anything ornate would have been out of keeping with the nature of the poem. The customary resource of the composer is employed with full effect, and it remains yet another example of Sir Hubert Parry's power of writing vocal music that has a definite and individual ring. An appropriate atmosphere is established at the beginning by an introduction of pastoral character which creates a cheerful mental picture. The impression of simple joy is never disturbed throughout the work. Some broad unison effects from the chorus, a fine choral passage in Sir Hubert Parry's best style, illustrative of the celestial choirs, a melodious and well-written section for the solo voice, and a well-wrought climax before the calm end are the features in this gratifying work. . . . The fame of the work is likely to extend, carrying with it an increase of the renown of the composer.

STAR.

The composer has reproduced the archaic quaintness of the text and there is a fine joyousness about the music. It has an abundance of characteristic Parryish climaxes in which bustling figures tumble over each other in sheer exuberance of spirits, and sometimes, as in the charming pastoral opening, a higher imaginative note is touched. The skill with which the melody of the refrain is varied is notable.

IN

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY
JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—X.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

A MANUAL OF PLAINSONG

FOR DIVINE SERVICE

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES NOTED

THE PSALTER NOTED

TO GREGORIAN TONES

TOGETHER WITH THE LITANY AND RESPONSES

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plainson and Mediæval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plainson, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendixes to the Psalter; and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plainson. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plainson during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

"Novello's Organ Album No. 3 is remarkably good value. For the modest sum of three and sixpence, you get twelve pieces of varying excellence. As a rule, such albums are a kind of musical dust-heap, in which the purchaser delves (not too successfully) for his moneysworth. You need have no anxiety in this case."—Musical Opinion, June, 1912.

"The Sonatina must be classed as one of the finest works in modern organ literature. The first movement is practically in usual Sonata form. The development section is particularly brilliant, and the quiet cadence leading into the recapitulation is of arresting beauty."

"The slow movement, in the nature of a chaconne, is beautiful and restful. A brilliant cadenza leads to an exciting introduction to a most interesting triple fugue (confined to manuals). Afterwards the composer works backwards through the sections preceding the fugue, unwinding himself, as it were, before starting on a magnificent Coda befitting a magnificent work."—Daily Mail.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

1A. TECHNICAL PRACTICE (1st Position)	2s. 6d.	1B. STUDIES (1st Position)	2s. 6d.
2A. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.	2B. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.
3A. DITTO ... (1st to 5th Position)	3s. 6d.	3B. DITTO ... (1st to 5th Position)	3s. 6d.

Competition Festival Record

No. 54.

MARKING SCHEMES.

In our issue for January, 1910, marking schemes for the use of adjudicators at competitions were given. Since this publication an agreement has been come to by the committees of many of the chief Festivals—Morecambe, Blackpool, Birmingham, &c.—and many experienced adjudicators, to adopt a maximum of 100 marks (instead of 80). It will therefore probably be useful to many interested to show how the new maximum is apportioned under the various heads. The observations that accompanied the scheme in our former issue are reprinted, with some necessary modifications.

Plans of assessing positive and relative values of performances at competitions are often discussed. Some judges favour the easy-going and, we are tempted to add, indolent plan of recording general impressions in a few words. Their judgment may be correct, although the record afterwards is vague. If, say, eight choirs each sing three pieces, such a dependance upon general impressions invites disaster, for it is quite impossible for any judge to memorise the features of all the performances and to relate them scientifically to one another. If this is conceded, the next consideration is, Under what heads should the performances be analysed? Here there is room for difference of opinion. Some schemes of headings we have seen, seem to us to attempt too much by way of analysis and therefore not to be practicable in the average conditions of competitions. It is important to group together as many points as are compatible, in order that there may not be too much time spent in the apportionment of marks or observations. Then comes another and very important matter: Should the impressions under each head be registered by figures or words? Our own experience is strongly in favour of figures. Under any one head it is fairly easy to register satisfactorily by figures slight differences of merit that no word can define so clearly. Thus, if one choir, say, is allowed 20 out of 30 for expression, it is easy to apportion 21 to another choir slightly better, and 19 to a third choir not quite so good. But it is almost impossible to find words that will relate a number of performances to an ideal standard. The figures, then, are really a refined vocabulary, easily applied by the most adjectiveless adjudicators. Yet words, some aptly chosen, are an indispensable supplement to the figures, for they register shades of meaning that cold figures will not afterwards recall.

The marking scheme given below is one that (with a maximum of 80) has been extensively used in this country for many years. It is no doubt open to criticism in its attempt to balance the value of the various heads, but it has on the whole proved its utility by holding the field.

THE LONG PHRASE.

Among the faults of interpretation rather frequently found in performances at competitions is the tendency of soloists and choirs to break up musical phrases because of some supposed demand of the words. Sometimes this practice almost destroys the composer's idea, and it forces an audience—if they are capable of the act—to re-join the fragments presented before the phrase can be felt or appreciated. The greatest artists do not destroy the music in order to make the words clear. They endeavour to graft the words and their phrasing on to the musical phrase. Miss Elena Gerhardt is a model in this respect. Her phrasing is dictated by the music, and yet the verbal sense is preserved. At a recent recital given at Bechstein Hall she sang nineteen songs. Below we quote some stanzas from one of the songs she sang, and the breathing places, or rather we should say the phrasing (because she does not breathe simply because she wants to, but because the act marks out the phrase) are denoted by an asterisk:

'DER MUSENSOHN'

('The Son of the Muses').

{ Durch Feld und Wald zu schweifen, { Mein Liedchen weg zu pfeifen,*
So geht's von Ort zu Ort,*
Und nach dem Takte reget,*
{ Und nach dem Maas bewege
{ Sich Alles an mir fort.
{ Ich kann sie kaum erwarten,
{ Die erste Blum' im Garten,*
Die erste Blüt' am Baum,*
{ Sie grüssen meine Lieder,
Und kommt der Winter wieder,*
{ Sing' ich noch jenen Traum.

The lines bracketed were sung without a perceptible break. The other stanzas were similarly treated, and so were the other songs. And all was so natural and fluent!

SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITION IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The School Choir Competition movement which is promoted by the Education authorities in the province of the Cape of Good Hope continues to flourish. In the number of the Education Gazette dated November 14, four competitions are described. The following are reports. Mr. Arthur Lee, Departmental Instructor, adjudicated on all four occasions.

OUDTSHOORN PUBLIC SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITION.

THIRD-CLASS AND POOR SCHOOLS.

The first contest for the Challenge Shield recently established in the interests of the above-mentioned schools was held in the Hall of the Y.M.C.A., Oudtshoorn, on August 5. There were three entries, viz., Oudtshoorn Adderley Street A.3, Oudtshoorn Hebrew A.3, and Armoed South A.3. Considering the very promising state of singing in many of the schools of this district, a better response is expected next year.

A correct rendering of 'Ye mariners of England,' the song prescribed, was given by each choir. Adderley Street School sang with more pleasing quality of tone, but their opponents gave a more sustained account of the alto part. The former were the more expressive, but the pitch was kept by neither. 'Heav'n' was sung as a dissyllable by the Adderley Street children. The singing of 'Hope will banish sorrow,' the item selected by both choirs, was marked by similar features. All the choristers experienced much trouble with the two-part sight-test. The Hebrew School Choir gripped both the time and tune of the unison test in a more confident manner.

The award was made in favour of the Hebrew Public School, Oudtshoorn, trained by Mr. A. Klein.

BREDASDORP AND CALEDON PUBLIC SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITION.

Caledon High School Choir sang in the local Town Hall before a good house on Wednesday, September 11, Napier and Bredasdorp at latter place on September 18, also before a large audience. The selected songs were: 'Pilgrims' Chorus from 'Tannhäuser' by Wagner (Caledon) and 'Thoughts of home' by H. E. Nichol (Bredasdorp and Napier).

The part-singing of the Caledon Choir was of very finished quality. The choristers were under perfect control, and sang with full and rich quality of tone. Unfortunately, owing to a misunderstanding 'O hush thee, my baby,' the prescribed song for 1913, was prepared instead of 'Mark the merry elves.'

The singing of both the other choirs surpassed all their previous efforts. The parts were well sustained, the words clear, and expression fairly good. The finish of the closing cadence, however, found both of them a little down in pitch.

The Bredasdorp choir read the sight-tests with more confidence than either of the others, and showed less dependence upon leaders. Time was the weak element of each, and in the short transition the feeling of true relationship was disturbed. Caledon earned the highest number of points, but through the mishap already noted, the shield was awarded to the choir of Bredasdorp Public School, conducted by Miss J. Loxton.

The ear-test consisted of a song of sixty-four notes with a change of key to the dominant.

BREDASDORP AND CALEDON MISSION SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITION.

The first competition for the Challenge Shield for Mission School Choirs in the districts of Bredasdorp and Caledon was held on September 10, 16, 17, on which dates the choirs of Caledon English Church, Stanford English Church, and Elim Moravian Mission Schools were heard in rotation. The attendance of parents was excellent at Caledon and Elim. The set piece was Henry Leslie's arrangement of the madrigal, 'The nightingale,' by Thomas Weelkes (1600); and the items chosen by the several choirs were: 'The fountain,' H. Elliot Button (Caledon Eng. Ch. B.), 'A wet day,' Alfred Redhead (Stanford Eng. Ch. B.), 'Who will to the greenwood hie?' J. L. Hatton (Elim Mor. B.).

The best part of the singing was given by the Elim children. Obedience to the baton and gesture of the conductor were perfect. 'Zephyr' was sung as 'Zeephyr' and 'sound' as 'soond.' Articulation of consonants was a little overdone, and caused some faulty phrasing. The Caledon Choir sang with much spirit but with little expression. The tone of the Stanford children was of pleasing quality. The majority of the latter were, however, very young. The sight-reading of the Moravian choir was excellent. Both of the English Church Choirs got into difficulties with the time.

The award was made in favour of the Elim Moravian School Choir, trained by Mr. D. Joost.

The Ear-test prizes were won by Arthur Jacobus and Mercia Evelyn Kleinschmidt (Caledon); Lilian Titus and Amie Klasse (Stanford) and Rudolph Joost, who had seventy notes out of seventy-two correct, and Frederick Willems (Elim), with sixty-seven correct.

KAROO PUBLIC SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITION.

The choirs were heard in the Town Hall, Beaufort West, on August 16. The singing was followed with deep interest by a large audience, presided over by Senator Weber. The arrangements were successfully carried out by Mr. D. A. Dodds, Principal of Beaufort West Boys' High School. The hospitality of the inhabitants was appreciated warmly by the visitors, and a balance of £9 5s. 9d. was available for distribution among the choirs which took part. The competitors were:

Murraysburg A.1, conducted by Miss E. Rademeyer.

Prince Albert A.1, conducted by Mr. Kriel.

Victoria West A.1, conducted by Mr. M. Whiteford (holders of the Shield).

The award was made on the singing of the following items:

1. 'Patter, patter,' J. L. Hatton.
2. (a) 'Good-night, good-night, beloved,' Pinsuti. Four-part arrangement for mixed voices. (Prince Albert.)
- (b) 'Good-night, good-night, beloved,' Pinsuti. Three-part arrangement for equal voices. (Victoria West.)
- (c) 'Sleep, gentle lady,' H. R. Bishop. (Murraysburg.)
3. Unison sight-test.
4. Two-part sight-test.

Prescribed Song: The Victoria West children excelled in this item. The opening phrase was a great success and a fine piece of piano singing. The crescendo passages, too, were developed with skill, though the last one was unfortunately spoiled by one boy; but the piece was concluded in perfect tune. This was the only choir that earned full marks for pitch in every item. The renderings given by the other choirs told of intelligence and painstaking preparation. The mixed voices of the Prince Albert Choir spoiled the piano passages, and the middle part of the last phrase was somewhat feeble.

Selected Songs: (a) A difficult part-song was given with much feeling and finish. Tone of the bass and tenor lacked culture here and there. (b) In most respects excellent. The feeling of lassitude underlying 'While I count the weary hours' was all that could be desired. Some of the difficult entries were entrusted to leaders. (c) Sung delicately and beautifully phrased. A little out of tune with the pianoforte.

Unison Sight-test: Well sung by Murraysburg and Prince Albert. The latter showed greater confidence in singing to laa, and Victoria West more dependence on certain leaders.

Two-part Sight-test: Murraysburg: First reading very good indeed, but the altos when vocalising wavered a little in the transitional passages. Prince Albert: First reading too slow, but later more satisfactory. Altos good, despite a couple of weak rhythms. Victoria West: Altos good; much trouble experienced with the time, and the parts did not keep together well.

The points scored were:

	Murraysburg.	Prince Albert.	Victoria West.
Prescribed Song	76	70	87
Selected Song	81	80	82
Unison Test	76	83	72
Two-part Test	70	70	49
	303	303	290

The result was declared a tie between the choirs of the Public Schools of Murraysburg and Prince Albert.

EAR-TEST COMPETITION.

The test was a melody of seventy-two notes with a change of key to the dominant. Very few of the competitors had less than sixty notes correct.

OTLEY.—December 7.

This musical contest, held in the Mechanics' Institute, Otley, was entirely successful. There were sixty-nine entries, compared with thirty-nine last year and fifty-eight in 1910. In the afternoon the competing choirs sang the test-pieces selected for them, and in the evening sang their own selections. The following were the chief awards: Soprano solo: 1st, Miss Alice Youngman, Otley. Boys' solo: 1st, George Jowett, Bradford (this class, in which there were seventeen entries, was one of particular merit). Baritone solo: 1st, George Ould, Leeds. Mixed-voice choirs: 1st, Eccleshill Prize Choir (Mr. J. T. Wilcock); 2nd, Thornton Vocal Union (Mr. W. Lloyd Ashton).

The adjudicator was Mr. W. Lawson Berry, conductor of the well-known Nelson Arion Glee Union.

SKIPTON.—December 14.

This Festival was the first of its kind in the locality. There were fifty-seven entries in six solo and four choral classes. The adjudicator was Mr. A. T. Akroyd, of Ilkley.

The solo prize-winners were the following: Lily Bullock (children's pianoforte solo), R. Phillip (children's violin solo), George Sadler (boys' vocal solo), Nellie Barraclough (girls' vocal solo), Miss Bella Langman (soprano), Mr. J. W. Overend (bass). In the children's choral section, Skipton Junior Rechabites (Mr. A. Townsend) gave the best performance of 'Now let us make the welkin ring' (Hatton), and Skipton Congregational Sunday School gave the best sight-singing. Among the competing church and chapel choirs the first in the test-piece was Skipton Trinity Wesleyan, and in the sight-test Skipton Congregational.

The Long Eaton Junior Prize Choir, of whom Mr. William Woolley, of Nottingham, is the conductor, are not content merely to compete, but frequently exhibit the high results of their training to local audiences. A concert given at Long Eaton on December 14 exemplified this zeal. The programme included several of the test-pieces with which the Choir had won prizes at competitions, and the cantata, 'The spider and the fly' (Bridge), was an excellent wind-up. It was very popular with the children.

NEVIN (NORTH WALES).—The fourth 'Chair' Eisteddfod was held on November 26, and attracted a large number of competitors. In the chief choral competition the Pwllheli Choir and the Nevin Choral Society competed. After a keen contest the prize was awarded to the Nevin Choir. The adjudicator was Dr. Caradog Roberts.

The report of the Leith Hill Competition for the eighth season 1911-12 is a satisfactory one. A further development of the work is recorded. The total expenditure, including the cost of concerts, was £173 3s. 5d., and the receipts amounted to £200 or. 7d.

SOUTH AND WEST LONDON FESTIVAL.

March 1, 3, 5, 6, 8.

This excellent organization grows in importance. It will be held at the Town Hall, Wandsworth, on the above dates, and a concert by the prize-winners will be given at the Crystal Palace on Saturday, March 15. H.R.H. The Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein is the President, and the list of patrons and committee is a strong one, and there is even an hon. consulting solicitor (Mr. A. T. Cummings) to keep matters in order. Eleven adjudicators are named. The ultimate criterion of a scheme of this sort is, however, not lists of names, but the quality of the lists of music; for if high ideals are not placed before competitors, it is difficult to claim any educational virtue for Competitive Festivals. As to this matter, the South London syllabus can afford to challenge close examination. We doubt if ever before in the history of this event has such an excellent selection been chosen. It is not that the tests are particularly modern or exceptionally difficult. They represent the type of good music that it is possible for average resources to perform adequately, and to enjoy. There are seven classes for adult choirs, three for junior choirs and for girls' clubs. Solo-singing is divided into ten classes, pianoforte-playing into nineteen classes, there is one class for organ-playing, nine for strings, and eight for elocution and the theory of music and harmony. The Board of Trinity College offers a prize of nine guineas, and amongst the other prizes there is a challenge shield given by the Worshipful Company of Musicians. Entries close on February 8. The secretary is Mr. T. Lester Jones, 130, Belgrave Road, Wanstead, N.E.

BOLTON.—April 24, 25, 26.

This is a new Festival, which starts under very favourable auspices. Forty-two classes are enumerated in the syllabus, and the tests generally are chosen with discretion. Mr. Granville Bantock, Mr. Rawdon Briggs, and Mr. C. H. Fogg are to adjudicate. The secretary is Mr. H. Vickers, 47, Knowsley Street, Bolton. Rule 20 states that no reply to communications will be sent unless a stamped addressed envelope is enclosed. The new scheme of marking described on the first page of the RECORD is adopted in the syllabus.

DATES OF COMPETITIONS AND NAMES OF SECRETARIES.

EVERY COMPOSER should send for DINHAM, BLYTH & CO.'S Specimens and Price Lists (free) for Lithographing Anthems, Songs, &c. 50 Copies of Hymn-Tune, Kyrie, &c., 3s. 6d.; 100, 4s. 6d. 27, Fenchurch Street, London. Established 1879.

PLAYING AT SIGHT IS EASY — NOT DIFFICULT.

The generally accepted idea amongst pianists—whether professionals or amateurs—is that nothing but continual practice will give the ability to play at sight. As an actual fact, this is far from being the case, since, by means of the EHREMYER System, the ability can be acquired after three months of practice for a short time daily. In this time any pianist can acquire the ability to play at sight all music that is not beyond his technical powers. Only a few have the natural gift of sight-playing, but all others have now the opportunity to become sight-players without the drudgery of practice which has hitherto been necessary.

BRINSMEAD

Among the many distinctions defining the world-famous Brinsmead Piano is the preference it has won among Royalties. Both The King and Queen have "Brinsmeads" in the Royal Household; in addition, the Kings of Italy, Sweden, Bavaria, the Shah of Persia, Queen Alexandra, and many Foreign potentates possess these British pianos.

Though "Brinsmeads" vary in price, they are all identical so far as essential quality is concerned. Though the firm now produce a piano within the reach of the most moderate means, the trade-mark "John Brinsmead & Sons, London," on any instrument is a guarantee of those vital features which have won Royal favour.

WAGNER AND SUPER-WAGNER.

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

I.

It would be very interesting if some enterprising interviewer in the shades could procure for us Wagner's opinion upon the course of events in music in general and the opera in particular during the thirty years that have elapsed since his death. He would probably cling with his characteristic tenacity to the views he held in his lifetime; but if he were candid he would have to admit that the old problems have latterly taken on a new aspect. The theories he expounded so eagerly in his prose works and illustrated so eloquently in his music-dramas have not passed through the fire of thirty years' criticism without suffering some loss of vitality. Supposing a brain as comprehensive, as variously gifted, and as forceful as his were now to take up the problem of opera, seeing it all afresh as Wagner did, and combining, like him, all the potencies of the best instrumental and operatic music of his day into one vast synthesis, what would be the new form he would strike out—for that a new form is now a necessity is evident both on a priori and a posteriori grounds. Music could no more stand still after Wagner than after Bach or Beethoven; a new humanity must find a new expression for its own reading of life. And a survey of the opera since Wagner's death leaves no room for doubt that the emotions and aspirations of the new humanity have not yet found the form most appropriate to them. Wagner has no more succeeded in making his special type of musical drama the norm for later generations than Bach succeeded in imposing the forms of his music upon the art of the epochs that have followed him. In each case the spirit endures, but not the form. Some elements of the Wagnerian form have of course become, as far as we can judge, permanent factors in opera in general,—the use of leading themes, for example, and the system of entrusting a melodious, flowing, quasi-symphonic development to the orchestra. But not even these elements are recognised as indispensable constituents of opera everywhere: Debussy, for instance, discards both of them in the greater part of his 'Pelleas and Melisande.' For the rest, the departures from Wagner's precepts are noticeable enough, especially as regards the poetic basis of opera. Apart from the negligible work of his second-rate imitators, it would be hard to point to a single opera by a man of genius that follows Wagner in its reliance upon myth as the clearest and most fundamental expression of the 'purely human,' or in his planning of the subject so as to reduce to a minimum the less musical matter in the text, and make the whole opera, as far as may be, a pure expression of nothing but 'soul-states.'

II.

Wagner's famous formula was that hitherto the means in opera (the music) had been taken for the end, and the end (the drama) for the means. His own avowed object was to restore to the drama the right of pre-eminence in opera. His claim to have done so is only valid if we define music and drama in the rather limited senses he had in view when framing his theory. His proposition is correct enough if we take it to mean that music must not, as in the Italian opera, occupy the ear to the exclusion of all worth in the story and all psychological interest in the characters. In the sense that he made opera acceptable to men's heads and hearts as well as their ears, Wagner certainly did make the drama the end, and music the means. But viewed more broadly, his work was really the greatest glorification of music that the theatre had ever seen; for while he enormously increased the expressive scope of it, he cut out of drama more than half the elements that give that word a meaning apart from music. Drama, with him, meant in the last analysis little more than the best possible text for stage music. He would have denied this interpretation of his theories and practice, but all the same that is the upshot of them. 'Word-speech,' he says, is merely the organ of the intellect, and has therefore the right of entry into music—the emotional art par excellence—only so far as it is necessary to give coherence to the indeterminate flood of feeling that music pours out; and music can, and ought, only to ally itself with words that have themselves an emotional content. It was for this reason that he rejected historical and political subjects, and found the ideal 'stuff' for opera in the 'purely human' legends of the folk; and in 'A Communication to my Friends' he traces in close detail the gradual growth of his perceptions in this respect. What was hidden from him, what, indeed, he persistently denies, is now evident to everyone else,—that the change in his theories and practice was due to the musician in him slowly asserting himself with greater and greater urgency, and finally demanding imperatively a form of text that would allow his gift of musical expression the utmost possible freedom. It must always be borne in mind that Wagner's theory of a unification of all the arts in the one art-work was the product of a brain that had comparatively little sympathy with, or understanding of, any art but music. This may seem a hard saying, but the proof of it is to be found in many declarations in his prose works, his letters, and 'Mein Leben.' He could never see in painting, in the prose drama, in poetry, and in sculpture, precisely what painters, dramatists, poets, and sculptors saw there. He seriously thought that 'the spoken form of play' (die Schauspielform) must 'necessarily vanish in the future'; and that painters would give up their 'egoistic' filling of little canvases and be content to devote their powers to contributing, along with the poet, the musician, and the rest of them, to the 'united art-work of the future.' Clearly it was the musician in him that dominated everything else, and determined both the choice of subject for his own operas and the manner of their treatment. 'What I saw,' he says in 'A Communication to my Friends,' 'I now looked at solely with the eyes of music.' He is careful to add, not of the formal, cramping style of music, but of the kind that came straight from the heart and which he could pour out like a speech in a mother-tongue. That is the whole secret; the 'music' he wishes to see made subordinate to 'drama' is the music that claims to pursue an egoistic existence, bound by its own arbitrary laws alone; but though his music must be natural and unfettered by conventional formulas, and must aim at giving heightened emotional expression to the feeling suggested by the verse and the action, it is still the predominant partner in the union, and only so much of the stuff of the verbal drama will be permitted in the art-work as will give point to the vague musical emotion without hindering its full expression. Like a musician, he saw drama from a purely musical angle.

III.

But granting the premisses implicit in Wagner's theory,—that music is an art of intensely emotional expression, that it can only ally itself with poetry and drama on the condition that these allow themselves to be bent to its will, and that the ideal 'stuff' for an opera is that which contains the minimum of matter that music cannot take up into itself and endow with its own loftier and warmer life,—it surely becomes evident that the theory cannot be allowed to end there. In a long article on programme music in my 'Musical Studies' (1905), I have argued that the strictly logical conclusion of Wagner's own theory is not the music-drama but the symphonic poem. He himself admitted that the more we can refine away from the music-drama all the non-musical matter,—the matter that is required merely to make the nature of the characters and the thread of the story intelligible to an audience sitting on the other side of the footlights,—the nearer we shall approach the ideal. It was for this reason that he was dissatisfied with his earlier works, and so proud—justifiably proud—of 'Tristan,' where, as he said, he 'plunged into the inner depth of soul events, and from out this centre of the world fearlessly built up its outward form. A glance at the volumen of this poem will show you at once that the exhaustive detail work which an historical poet is obliged to devote to clearing up the outward bearings of his plot, to the detriment of a lucid exposition of its inner motives, I now trusted myself to apply to these latter alone. Life and death, the whole import and existence of the outer world, here hang on nothing but the inner movements of the soul.' There is a touch of exaggeration in the claim, but in the main it holds good; 'Tristan' comes nearer to being all music and nothing else but music than any other work of Wagner. I suggested that in the symphonic poem, rightly planned and rightly worked out, we had the nearest possible approach to this ideal, and I availed myself of a simile Browning uses in 'The Ring and the Book,'—that of the jeweller who finds it advantageous to mix a certain amount of alloy with the gold while he is working at the ring, but afterwards burns it out with a spirit of acid, leaving the circlet of pure gold. The practice of the composer of the symphonic poem seems to me to be analogous to this: he uses the alloy in the first stages to give coherence to the tissue of his work, but leaves none of it visible in the work itself; to vary the simile, he uses poetry as his scaffolding, but as his scaffolding only. The trouble with opera—viewed from an ideal standpoint—is that it too often shows the scaffolding projecting at a score of points through the finished building.

IV.

Apart from theory, we have only to look at a few concrete instances of both types of art to see that the ideal symphonic poem is the unalloyed quintessence of opera, and that the average opera is merely a symphonic poem puffed out to three acts, and made rather loose of tissue in the process. What could be easier than to make a three-act opera of 'Ein Heldenleben,'—and what more futile? Apart from the Adversaries, there are only two characters in 'Ein Heldenleben,' and we cannot fill up a whole theatrical evening with two characters alone. To have made an opera of it Strauss would have had to get a librettist to surround the only two persons who really matter with a number of minor persons who do not matter in the least; and after spending three or four hours in the theatre we should come away with precisely the same fundamental impression as 'Ein Heldenleben' gives us in the concert-room in about forty minutes,—that a hero has passed through sundry spiritual developments, and at last, after much battling and much error, attained to a super-earthly resignation. This is the ring; everything else we should see and hear in the theatre would only be so much alloy, pleasurable or tiresome. Who does not feel, again, that all the essential emotions of the story of Francesca da Rimini are given us in Tchaikovsky's tone-poem? Who wants to see the mere historical and topographical details that would be inevitable in an opera on that subject? Who wants to see the furniture of the house of Malatesta, and the ladies and gentlemen moving about among it? Who wants to see and hear Giovanni? He interests us only as a fragment of the force of fate that drives Paolo and Francesca to love and death; surely we are content to accept his existence as assumed in the great central tragedy, without having him put before us in the flesh to sing a lot of words that do not matter? Who does not feel that Strauss has given us the quintessence of 'Macbeth' in his symphonic poem, and that no opera on that subject could hope to express the spiritual tragedy of Macbeth so swiftly and so drastically? Or, to look at the matter from the other side, take the case of 'Salome.' Does anything really count there but the train of moods in Salome's soul, and is not all this expressed incomparably and fully in the great final scene,—with perhaps a little assistance from the music of the impassioned monologue of Salome to Jochanaan in the earlier part? What is all the rest of the opera but a mere recital or representation of a story the details of which everyone in the theatre already knows quite well? How Herod was married to Herodias, the mother of Salome, how Herod gave a banquet and became enamoured of his step-daughter, how one Jochanaan, a Jewish prophet, had been imprisoned by order of Herod, how Salome conceived an unholy passion for Jochanaan, how she danced for Herod and won as her reward the head of Jochanaan on a charger—who needs to go to the theatre to be told all this; who takes more than the most languid interest in the telling of it? Music has next to no concern with most of it, because it is of a quality that prevents music attaining to its full emotional incandescence; and it is only when it is playing with ease and ardour round a subject fit to call out the best there is in it that music is really worth writing. If anyone doubts that it is only the final scene and the monologue of ‘Salome’ that count for anything in the opera, let him ask himself how many people would stay away from the theatre or the concert-room because only these portions were being given, and how many people would go to the theatre if it were known that these portions were to be omitted. Or again, does the whole opera of ‘Tannhäuser’ tell us very much that is not already told us in the Overture? I am not alleging, of course, that there is not a great deal of very interesting music in the opera. The question is whether the essence of the struggle in Tannhäuser’s soul between spiritual and physical love is not fully given us in the Overture, and whether, had this alone been written, we should have felt any more need for an opera upon the subject than we do for an opera on the subject on ‘Ein Heldenleben.’ What is the opera of ‘Fidelio,’ Wagner asked, but a mere lengthy watering down of the dramatic motives that have been painted so finely for us in the great ‘Leonora’ Overture No. 3? May we not say as much of ‘Tannhäuser’? Is not a great deal of this also a mere expansion of the theme to comply with the exigencies of a whole evening in the theatre?

V.

It is true that Wagner tried to demonstrate that the symphonic poem was a less perfect art-form than the music-drama, inasmuch as it left it to the imagination to supply the characters, the events, or the pictures upon which the music is founded, whereas these really ought to be shown to the eye upon the stage. But a twofold answer can be given to Wagner. In the first place, there are dozens of passages in his own works that depend for their effect upon precisely that visualising power of the imagination the legitimacy of which he denied in the case of the symphonic poem. Is Siegfried’s Rhine Journey, for example, intelligible on any other supposition than that with each change of theme in the music the hearer’s imagination visualises a fresh episode in the hero’s course? How do we listen to the ‘Meistersinger’ Overture except just in the way we listen to a symphonic poem—the imagination calling up before it the bodily presence of each of the characters in turn? In the second place, the evidence is overwhelming that Wagner’s own imagination was much more restricted in this respect than that of other people; and it was precisely this inability to trust very much to the visualising power of the imagination that made him fall into so many crude errors of realism. All his life through he was unable to see that the imagination has a much wider scope than the eye, because, not being tied down to the mere spatial dimensions of an object, it can add enormously to it from out of its own store of memory and vision. Vastness is a quality inseparable from any concept of a god; but can the grandest creation of sculpture or the most heroic of stage figures ever hope to give us such a sense of the illimitable power and beauty of godhead as the imagination can supply? Whose god is the greater—the invisible one of Milton or Spinoza, or the visible Wotan of Wagner? Does not the least analytical spectator of a Wagnerian opera often feel that it would have been better if the composer had insisted less on material facts upon the stage and left a freer wing to our imagination? How much of the exquisite poetry of the idea of the Waldweben—the natural, untainted boy at home in nature’s heart, dowered by his native innocence with the gift of understanding the song of birds—is spoiled for us by the generally grossly unideal figure of the actor, by the reduction of the wayward breath and infinite soul of nature to a few yards of painted pasteboard, and by the narrowing down of all our ideas of the glorious freedom of bird-life to one poor piece of stuffed mechanism jerked at the end of a wire! Who would exchange the imagination’s vision of the glorious Valkyrie-flight through the storm and the cloud-wrack for the actual visible Grane, with his suggestion of having been groomed at the mews round the corner? Who that is moved by the Grail music in ‘Parsifal’ has not felt his heart sink within him at the sight of the slow mechanical evolutions of the Knights in the Grail scene at Bayreuth? Who has not felt, at the sight of the ‘property’ swan, that the rarefied atmosphere of Montsalvat has gone, and with it most of the remoteness, the shining whiteness, of Lohengrin? Or, not to multiply instances of this kind from the Wagnerian operas themselves, who can doubt the general proposition that the more the subject approaches the sublime the more it demands purely poetic or musical treatment, and the more lamentably it suffers by being narrowed down to a canvas or a stage? What painter could hope to suggest, even in the largest picture, the vision of the vast evil form of Lucifer and the mighty sweep of his fall, that Milton can give us in a word or two; and who, in spite of all the greatness of the music of the ‘Ring,’ does not feel that the actual spectacle of gods and heroes that has been put before our eyes on the stage cannot compare in true sublimity with the picture given us in the opening lines of Morris's 'Sigurd the Volsung':

There was a dwelling of Kings ere the world was waxen old;

Dukes were the door-wards there, and the roofs were thatched with gold;

Earls were the wrights that wrought it, and silver nailed its doors;

Earls' wives were the weaving-women, queens' daughters strewn its floors,

And the masters of its song-craft were the mightiest men that cast

The sails of the storm of battle adown the bickering blast. There dwelt men merry-hearted, and in hope exceeding great Met the good days and the evil as they went the way of fate:

There the gods were unforgotten, yea whiles they walked with men,

Though e'en in that world's beginning rose a murmur now and then

Of the midward time and the fading and the last of the latter days,

And the entering in of the terror, and the death of the People's Praise.

How the imagination fills out the ample spaces here left to it to play among—how great and god-like and noble and beautiful a world of men and women it is that the poet evokes for us!

VI.

The elimination from an opera-text of everything that is not suited to musical expression is perhaps an unattainable ideal. It is only the titanic musical genius of Wagner that carries him and us more or less successfully past what we may call the baser metal in the structure of his music-dramas. Since his day the problem has proved so baffling a one that composers have frankly given it up in despair. Wagner was right: the simpler the story or legend on which we found an opera,—the more it can be trusted to make its own motive and stages clear,—the less non-musical matter shall we be burdened with, and the more chance we shall have of being able to keep the musical tissue on a consistently high level. The proof of this is to be found not only in Wagner's own work but in that of his successors. One can hardly recall more than some two or three modern operas in which, at some point or other, the composer has not to try to delude us into the belief that the music means something when it really means nothing. Take, for example, the opening scene of 'Elektra.' The scene is poetically necessary because it informs the spectator of the relations between Elektra and her mother, and of the miserable servitude of the maiden in the house of her murdered father. But no man that ever lived could set such words as these to good music; and all that Strauss can do is to make a mere pretence of writing music, let the orchestra play almost anything and the voices shriek almost anything, and trust to the audience being carried blindly along, partly by the excitement of the noise, partly by the distraction of the stage-movement. Wagner's superior artistic sense would have seen from the outset that this part of the libretto was outside the sphere of music, and, being his own librettist, he would, in obedience to the prompting of the musician in him, have so shaped the opera that there would have been no need to communicate that particular piece of information to us in this particular form. The procedure of Strauss and Hofmannsthal is hardly less absurd than that of the old composers who used to set to music not only the actual words of the Bible but 'Here beginneth the——chapter of the——book of——.'

How much of the merest putty, again, is left visible in the libretti of Puccini, Charpentier, and others—passages that are essential if the story is to be made clear to the spectator, but absolutely defying musical treatment. There is scarcely a single opera of which the music gives one the impression of pure necessity from first to last; every now and then our teeth are set on edge by some pieces of grit left by the bad cooks in an otherwise good dish. The handling of passages of this kind has become the most stereotyped of formulæ; the characters talk rather than sing, while the orchestra keeps the ear interested by playing pretty tunes on its own account. It is only the easy-going attitude towards all questions of form that is bred in us by the arts of the theatre that could possibly blind us for a moment to the helplessness and ineptitude of a method of this kind. Debussy evades the difficulty in another way. He starts with a text that is already a work of art, capable, without the assistance of music, of holding an audience interested in it by virtue of its own dramatic life and its fine literary quality. He is thus, to begin with, in a far stronger position than that of nineteen opera composers out of twenty, whose texts have no artistic quality of their own, and have to receive the whole breath of their life from the music. Having the good fortune to be working upon a libretto that is itself moving and beautiful, Debussy can frequently afford to leave it to speak for itself, his own contribution to it being sometimes no more than a momentary heightening of the force of the words by means of a poignant harmony or a suggestive spot of colour. I hope I shall not be held to be insensitive to the charm of Debussy's 'Pelleas and Melisande,' or to the rare musical invention of the more continuous portions of it, if I say that a good deal of the opera could have been written by a much less gifted man. Now that the novelty of it has passed off, it is seen to be not at all a difficult matter to subtilise a stage effect by the addition of a poignant chord here and there. 'Pelleas and Melisande' is an extremely beautiful work, but it will probably have no posterity,—because, while the more musical portions of it depend less for their effect on any essential novelty of form than upon the very individual quality of Debussy's imagination, the style of the other—the merely atmospheric—portions is so easy that it is within the scope of dozens of composers with only a quarter of Debussy's genius. Debussy, then, has not, any more than his contemporaries, solved the problem of weaving the combined vocal and orchestral tissue of the opera into a continuous and homogeneous whole; for a great part of the time he simply evades the problem. 'Pelleas and Melisande' is a tour de force that will probably never be repeated by any other musician; it depended for its success on the concurrence of a number of factors that are hardly likely to be met with in combination again.

VII.

To recapitulate, then, for a moment: Wagner's theory of the ideal music-drama is sound enough, but neither he nor any of his successors has been able to realise the theory in practice. In every combination of music with the other arts it must of necessity play the leading rôle, because of the greater expansiveness and superior warmth of its expression.* As Wagner saw, it will tolerate no text but one that is thoroughly musical in essence—that is to say, one that is so purely emotional throughout that at no time can we feel that in order to associate with it music has had to descend from its ideal sphere. It is in the process of making an action clear to the spectator that opera generally has to admit certain elements that drag music down from its high estate. We have therefore at present two chief forms of the association of poetry and music—the opera, in which actual characters, using actual words, are shown to us in the actuality of the stage, and the symphonic poem, in which we are given not the characters but the emotions of the characters, and not the scene but an imaginative suggestion of the scene, while the general nature of the subject is communicated to us by means of a printed explanation. This necessity of putting the hearer en rapport with the story by a device that stands outside the music seems to many people an ineradicable flaw in the symphonic poem: a work of art, they say, should be self-contained, and opera, with all its admitted faults, has the virtue of being its own explanation. I do not think, however, that this matter is so simple as it looks.

Closer analysis will show first of all that many apparently self-contained musical works are as greatly in need of verbal explanation as a symphonic poem, and secondly, that in the full sense of the term hardly any opera or drama can be said to be wholly self-explanatory, inasmuch as, at every hearing of it but the first, we witness the unfolding of the earlier stages of the action with a knowledge of the later stages, and are thus as effectually adding something from an outside source to the visual and auditory impression of the moment as when we follow a symphonic poem with the story in our minds that we have just read in the programme-book. What real difference, for example, is there between the frame of mind in which we listen to the 'Tannhäuser' Overture and that in which we listen to 'Ein Heldenleben'? In each case we are conscious that the music is not self-existent and self-explanatory, but depends for its full intelligibility on our knowledge of the characters and incidents upon which it is based. We get this knowledge in the case of 'Ein Heldenleben' from a book; in the case of the 'Tannhäuser' Overture we get it from our experience of the opera on the stage.* What essential difference is there between the two cases? In each of them we have to rely upon experience outside the work itself in order to grasp the full meaning of it. The 'Tannhäuser' Overture and other works of that class are, in fact, artistic solecisms. No one, surely, will contend that at the first performance of 'Tannhäuser' the Overture conveyed its poetic meaning to the audience any more clearly than a performance of 'Ein Heldenleben' would do without a literary explanation of its contents? The Overture does not explain the opera, but is explained by it; and it is consequently absurd to play it first. It only happens to come first because the old practice of having an orchestral introduction to an opera was unthinkingly retained long after the character of the introduction had so altered that there was no longer any sense in its use. The purpose of the overture originally was simply to play the audience into their seats. We see it performing this function in an overture like that to the 'Messiah'; the music has nothing to do with the oratorio itself, and a hundred other orchestral introductions would do just as well. But when opera composers began to make the overture a summary of the opera itself, they entered upon a course that ultimately made it an absurdity. In so far as the overture sums up the opera, and therefore depends for its intelligibility on a knowledge of the opera, it ought logically to be played not at the commencement of the evening, but at the end. Modern composers have instinctively recognised the truth of all this, and the operatic overture is now virtually abolished; there is none, for instance, to 'Salome,' 'Elektra,' or 'Pelleas and Melisande.'

All the overtures, then, that epitomise the opera with which they are connected are in the same category as the symphonic poem; for an understanding of the literary basis of them we have to go to a source outside themselves. The theory that a piece of music is bad music unless it is self-sufficing and self-explanatory is a mere nightmare of a moribund school of aestheticians. There are thousands of pages in Bach that only yield up their full secret to us when we get some outside light upon the sequence of poetic ideas in his mind at the time of writing. This is the case with many of the chorale preludes, for example. But Bach's music is often rich in a kind of allusive symbolism greatly resembling Wagner's use of the leading motive, though it is bolder than that, inasmuch as the musical symbol has not been made familiar to us by a previous definite use of it in the same work of art. In the 'Christmas Oratorio' Bach sets the words of a chorale addressing the infant Jesus to the music of another chorale that was already associated in the minds of the congregation with the Passion,

* This is the explanation of the fact that good music often saves a poor poem, while the best of poems has never been able to save poor music.

* We may, of course, get it from a programme note, but this in turn must have been derived from some experience of the opera, either on the stage or in the printed score.

—thus in a flash bringing the death of the Saviour into the same mental picture as the birth. The choral fantasia which the blind old man dictated to his pupil Altnikol a few days before his death united the music of the hymn 'In our hour of direst need,' with the words of 'I come before Thy throne.' And who can forget the effect, comparable to some of the most thrilling of those that Wagner makes with his leading motives, of the trumpet pealing out with the melody of 'Great God, what do I see and hear! The end of things created' in the midst of the bass recitative describing the terrors of the Day of Judgment (in the cantata 'Wachet, betet'). Bach anticipated, as he did most things in modern music, the Wagnerian use of the leading motive, the function of which is to suggest to the hearer's imagination another idea simultaneously with the one the music is explicitly expressing. I think Bach would have smiled at anyone who chose to object that his chorale in the 'Christmas Oratorio' was not self-sufficing, inasmuch as it depended for its affecting double meaning upon knowledge that the hearer had gathered elsewhere. He would probably have been satisfied with the unshakeable fact that the hearer had this knowledge, and that it was therefore quite safe to rely on his making use of it. Surely the composer of the symphonic poem and allied forms is also justified in trusting occasionally to his auditors' outside knowledge of the subject of his work. Is there anything less legitimate in Strauss's trusting to our imagination to summon up at performance the themes and the figures of 'Don Quixote,' than there is in Wagner's trusting to it, during the 'Tannhäuser' or 'Meistersinger' Overture, to summon up the scenes and figures of the opera? I have already pointed out that in his music-dramas Wagner is continually asking us, by means of recurrent leading motives, to visualise more than is actually set before us on the stage—thus flying in the face of his own theoretical arguments. It only needs to be added that he also relied, at times, as much as the writer of symphonic poems does upon the hearer's or spectator's knowing more about the course of the drama than has been revealed to him in the drama itself. How do we know, for example, that the 'Sword' motive in the final scene of the 'Rheingold' is a 'Sword' motive; how do we know the train of thought running through Wotan's mind at this point as he looks into the future? Simply by antedating the information we have gained from the later dramas of the 'Ring.' At the time the 'Sword' motive is first heard there has never been the slightest suggestion of the sword that is to help to lift the curse from the gods; not only Siegfried but Siegfried's parents are as yet unborn. Again, the phrase that Tannhäuser sings to the words 'Ha, jetzt erkenne ich sie wieder, die schöne Welt der ich entrückt' in the first Act of the opera, is explained only by the association of it with Elisabeth and the Hall of Song in the second Act. Anyone with a knowledge of the Wagnerian operas can multiply these instances for himself.

Does not everything, in fact, point to the impossibility of our listening to any performance of a drama or opera, except the first one, with a mind that is absolutely a clean slate? Are we not always drawing upon our store of acquired knowledge of the work, and blending this with the visual or auditory impressions of the moment? Do we not all know, long before it happens, that the screen will fall down at a certain climactic point in the 'School for Scandal' and show us Lady Teazle hiding behind it? Is not our appreciation of all the dialogue of this scene whetted by our knowledge—gained from 'outside' sources—of what is going to happen at the end of it? The instructed spectator or reader invariably keeps looking ahead, his interest or delight in what is occurring at the moment being intensified by what may be called anticipatory memory. It is only at the first time of reading 'Tom Jones' that we can be in the slightest doubt as to who is the hero's mother. The ever-present clue to the solution of the mystery does not spoil our pleasure, however, in the second and subsequent readings; nay, it rather adds to it, for it makes us conscious of a number of cunning strokes of construction that we had not noticed at the first reading. I take it, then, that an exaggerated importance can be attached to the principle of art being 'self-sufficing' and 'self-explanatory'; the subject is a far more complex one than the aestheticians have imagined. They had only to turn to the Greek drama to see a form of art in which deliberate use was made by an author of the fact that the audience had an 'outside' knowledge of the characters and events of the play. The Greek drama, speaking broadly, did not rely, as ours does, on the effect of a slow unfolding of a plot—the sole art of which consists in first of all giving the audience something to hunt for and then finding it for them. The Greek drama was based on a myth or a legend every detail of which was known to every member of the audience. At a first performance, therefore, the audience would be in precisely the same position as a modern audience is when it reads in its programme-book the analysis of a new symphonic poem that is about to be performed. And this knowledge, so far from diminishing the audience's enjoyment of the drama, actually intensified it, and permitted to the author an amount of subtle psychological allusion that can only be compared with the effects of the leading motive in modern opera. When Clytemnestra, for instance, in Æschylus's drama, greets Agamemnon with falsely-fawning words, the thrill of horror that ran through the Athenian audience came not from any feeling of foreboding inspired by the visible situation or the actual words, but from its outside knowledge that all this was feigning, and that the hounds of death were already hot on the track of the unsuspecting king. An Athenian, again, at the first performance of the 'Œdipus Rex,' must have known the whole of the story from the beginning. There could be for him none of the cumulative surprise at the slow unravelling of the web that we feel at a first reading of the tragedy; rather did he accompany the first blind steps of Œdipus with a pity born of the knowledge—the outside knowledge—of the doom the gods had woven for him.

VIII.

If, then, there is no æsthetic falsity involved in assuming some previous knowledge of the action or the motive on the part of the spectator, or in communicating this knowledge by other means than a stage presentation, why should we not boldly recognise that the time is ripe for a new form of art that shall carry the potency of music a step further than it was carried by Wagner? After all, it is the music that counts for ninety-five per cent. of our enjoyment of a Wagner opera. The 'philosophy' of the 'Ring' may be something to write and read about in the study, but in the theatre it really goes for very little. It is interesting to talk about the Schopenhauerian or Hindoo significance of the discourse of the lovers, in the second Act of 'Tristan,' upon Love and Death and Night and Day, but again—for how much does this count in the theatre? Has there ever been a single spectator, since 'Tristan' was first given, who could make out from the performance alone what philosophy it was the lovers were talking, or whether they were talking philosophy at all? And how many people who do know the text at this point—because they have read it—feel in the theatre that very much of the essential emotion of the work would be lost if the characters sang Chinese words, or Choctaw words, or no words at all, so long as the music was left to tell its own tale? I must guard against possible misunderstanding here. I am not for a moment urging that speech should henceforth be banished from opera as a mere superfluity. There are many subjects in which it will always be a necessity; the world of the 'Meistersinger,' for instance, could have been made real to us in no other medium than that of music with words. But I do contend that there are many poetic subjects in which virtually the whole of the expression could be entrusted with perfect safety to music alone,—not necessarily in the form of a symphonic poem, but in a sort of drama without actors—if the paradox may be permitted—or with speechless actors. And could we not in this way approach a step nearer to the ideal musical art-work, in which all the needful suggestiveness of poetry was retained without any admixture of the cruder non-musical elements that at present merely go to make plot and persons intelligible to the auditor?

IX.

Maeterlinck and others have of late familiarised us with the idea of a 'static' as distinguished from the older 'dynamic' drama. It is highly probable that in the future men will go to the theatre craving the satisfaction of rather different desires from those they seek to satisfy there now. That 'drama' is capable of more than one meaning is proved by the existence of dramatic forms so varied as those of the Greek drama, the Shakespearian drama, the Maeterlinckian drama, the 'Atalanta in Calydon' of Swinburne, and 'The Dynasts' of Thomas Hardy. It is quite reasonable to suppose, therefore, that a new generation may read another new meaning into the word. Among the finer minds of the present day there is a decided movement away from what seems to them the crudity of the old-style drama of action. Maeterlinck, in one or two of his essays, has given eloquent expression to the feelings that inspire this movement of revolt. Many of the time-honoured dramatic 'motives' are already sadly discredited. The dagger and the poison-bowl no longer play the part in tragedy that they used to play. Humanity has come to see that things of this kind are the mere excrescences of a dramatic action,—the mere crude outward and visible signs of desires and passions working in secret in the souls of men,—and their gaze is being turned more and more on the psychological springs of action rather than on the visible actions themselves. Drama, in the hands of thoughtful poetical writers, is becoming more and more an affair of the inner rather than the outer man; and it is probable that, as time goes on, still less reliance will be placed on the stage effect of violent action. It need hardly be said that as drama dispenses with piece after piece of action and explanation, and comes deeper down to the essence of tragedy as a war of impulses in a man's soul or of the Fates about his path, it approaches more nearly to the mood of music. We may look in the future to a yet further purging of poetic drama of many of the devices on which it is dependent so long as it has to play off a number of characters against each other on a few square yards of board in a theatre. I think I can foresee the time when most of what now passes for 'plot interest'—the pretence on the author's part of hiding something merely in order that it may in due time be triumphantly found again—will be regarded as something almost childish in the naive quality of its appeal, and will be relegated to forms of art as much below the general intellectual level of the literature of the day as the detective story is below the intellectual level of our own better novels and dramas. The more artistic the race becomes, the less will it crave for mere facts and events in drama, and the more for an imaginative reading of the soul on which the facts and events have written their record. Again let me interpolate a word of warning against a misunderstanding of my thesis. I am not supposing that a time will ever come when the drama as we have it now will have disappeared from the stage. I fully recognise that there are certain dramatic concepts that can never be adequately expressed except by means of clashing and marching and counter-marching characters, and action more or less violent or clockwork-like. But I fancy that in the not distant future the more poetic side of man will demand a form of art in which very little happens or is told, but in which the soul of the spectator is flooded by emotions of pity and sorrow and love that are all the more penetrating because they do not come to us through the relatively cold medium of words and the childish, creaking clockwork of exits and entrances and surprises and intrigue.

X.

It is this attitude of the artistic mind of the future towards drama that will, I think, find utterance in a form of quasi-dramatic music in which we shall be rid of all or most of the mere scaffolding of narration or action that serves at present simply to give intellectual support to the music of opera. Even in Wagner are we not painfully conscious at times of the fact that the music, which matters a great deal, is being diluted and made turbid by a quantity of baser matter the only function of which is to make it clear to us why these particular people are there at that particular moment, and what it is that they are doing? It cannot be reiterated too often that it is only the music that can keep alive any form of art into which music enters. Facts lose their force with repetition; it is only artistic emotion that can be born anew again and again and never die. Who feels anything but a glow of rapturous anticipation when the first notes of the 'Liebestod' or of Wotan's 'Abschied' are sounded? He may have heard it all a hundred times before, and know every note of it by heart; but it will all be as new and wonderful and inevitable to him at the hundredth hearing as at the first. But who does not groan to the depths of his spirit when Wagner's first care at the moment is not to kindle us with great music but to tell us at great length, and for the hundredth time, certain mere facts that have long lost their absorbing interest for us! And even in his most compact work—'Tristan'—is there not a great deal that is, from the highest point of view, superfluous? We can bear to hear the same glorious music time without number; but we will not bear being told time without number who Tristan and Isolde and Marke and Morold are, and how Tristan slew Morold, and how Isolde nursed Tristan back to health, and all the rest of it. I can imagine a 'Tristan' in which things of this kind would be assumed to be matters of common knowledge on the part of the audience, as the characters and motives of Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' or 'Francesca da Rimini' are assumed to be common knowledge, or those of Strauss's 'Macbeth' or 'Till Eulenspiegel,' or those of Beethoven's 'Coriolan' and 'Egmont' Overtures or the 'Leonora No. 3,' or those of Dukas's 'L'Apprenti sorcier.' Then the whole of the composer's time and the audience's attention could be devoted to that full musical exposition of nothing else but the protagonists' soul-states which Wagner avowed as the ideal of music-drama, but which is virtually an impossible ideal so long as opera is compelled to utilise so many actors on so much and no more of a stage, and to occupy so many hours of an evening.

As it happens, we already have in the Greek drama,—especially that of the older type,—a form of poetic art strongly resembling that which I am here suggesting might be now produced in music. Not only did the old Greek dramatist, as we have seen, largely rely upon the audience's knowledge of the characters and events of his play, and so save himself the necessity of much action or much scene-shifting, but he cast the drama into a concentrated form that enabled him to appeal rather to the spectator's sense of poetry than to the mere delight in external catastrophe and the unravelling of plot; while in the chorus he had under his hand an instrument extraordinarily capable of emotional expression. The Greek drama, in fact, was singularly akin to the music-drama of Wagner. As Wagner saw, the true modern equivalent of the Greek chorus is the orchestra; it is at once part of the action and aloof from it, an ideal spectator, sympathising, commenting, correcting. The Greek drama resembles ideal opera, again, in that the ultimate sentiment disengaged from it is one not of facts shown, or interest held by the mere interplay of intrigue, but of a high poetic spirit, purifying and transfiguring the common life of things.

Is not this form capable of further development? Is it not possible to construct an art-form in which the mere facts that it is necessary for us to know are either assumed as known or set before us in the briefest possible way, so that music can take upon itself the whole burden of expression, and the whole work of art be nothing but an outpouring of lofty quintessential emotion? Can we not imagine something like the second Act of 'Tristan' with silent and only dimly visible actors, the music, helped by their gestures, telling us all that is in their souls, while they are too remote from us for the crude personality of the actors and the theatrical artificiality of the stage-setting to jar upon us as they do at present? Cannot some story be taken as so well known to everyone that only the shadowiest hints of the course of it need be given to the spectator, the real drama being in the music? Or, to go a step further, cannot we dispense altogether with the stage and the visible actor, such external coherence as the music needs being afforded by impersonal voices floating through a darkened auditorium? The effect of disembodied voices can be made extraordinarily moving; in all my experience of concert-going I can remember no sensations comparable to those I felt during the Grail scene from 'Parsifal' at one of the Three Choirs Festivals; the exquisite beauty of the boys' voices floating down from one knew not where was something almost too much for mortal senses to endure. Here is an instrument, I think, the full emotional power of which is not yet suspected by composers. It lends itself admirably to just that desire for the exploration of the mysteries around us that music is always endeavouring to express. As the cruder kind of action goes out of drama, the hovering Fates will come in. Mr. Hardy, in 'The Dynasts,' has given us a hint of what may be done by a partial reversion to the Greek type of drama, the purblind, struggling human protagonists being surrounded by an invisible chorus of Fates that sees to the hidden roots of things. A poetic scheme of this kind could be made extremely impressive by music,—say a series of orchestral pictures of human desires and passions, having a simple intellectual co-ordination of their own, with an invisible chorus commenting upon it all now and then in the style of the Fates of Mr. Hardy or the chorus of Æschylus. There are, I think, several possible new art-forms open to us when we shall have learned to dispense, for certain purposes, with the actor and his speech, to rely upon the audience's previous knowledge of some story of universal interest and significance, and to leave it to music alone to express the whole of the dramatic or poetic implications of the story. But it is perhaps vain to try to forecast these future developments by means of reason. They will certainly come, but not by theorists taking thought of them; they will have to be born, as the Wagnerian drama was, out of the burning need of some great soul.

* Mr. Rutland Boughton has already made a very suggestive beginning on this line.

SIGFRID KARG-ELERT.

By A. EAGLEFIELD HULL.

If the history of music during the last four centuries clearly reveals its Zopf periods as well as its great climaxes of genius, still more does one section—organ music—show the never-ending rise and fall of human endeavour. After the period of Tye, Gibbons, Tallis, and Purcell, came a long stretch of unfruitful years right up to the time when the art flourished bravely again with the great Saxon's playing, only to fall back however until the advent of Bach's music with the Wesleys, father and son. Again a sudden lull; and when organ matters seemed to have sunk to the very lowest depths—when it appeared as if organists and organ music had got into some apparently hopeless backwater as regards the onward progress of the art in general, there suddenly rises a school of English organ-players and composers, with the appearance of two great German geniuses who are specializing and triumphantly asserting the claim of the quondam 'kist o' whistles' to retain its more modern title as 'the King of instruments.' With the works of Reger and Karg-Elert, the compositions of M. Joseph Bonnet (a worthy successor of the late Alexandre Guilmant in France), and with the support of a large body of gifted and enthusiastic English composers, a new force has come into organ music and playing, in the wave of which we are at present too much immersed to take a detached and judicial view.

Perhaps the name most constantly on the lips of organists at the present day is that of the subject of this sketch—Sigfrid Karg-Elert. Art works do not grow up like mushrooms in the night, nor are they gathered on gooseberry bushes; but they are the reflex of the life and environments of the artist from time to time. Rather the life of the spirit than of the body; but who shall say that the motions of the spirit and the very colouring of the thoughts are not influenced and moulded by the fortunes of life. So that if we want to understand thoroughly the music of any composer it is not mere curiosity which prompts us to ask for some details of his life and upbringing. To those familiar with the music of Karg-Elert, the following details will, it is hoped, serve to strengthen much that they have experienced when playing, hearing, or studying his compositions.

The year of his birth, 1878, shows us that even according to the average view of human powers, he is just entering on the full glory of his manhood. Born in Oberndorf, near Neckar, the twelfth and youngest child of J. V. Karg and his wife Marie, it is not surprising to find the boy early showed the strong Southern passions and impulses of the father's race, with the almost fierce energy, doggedness, and reserve of the mother's antecedents, who hailed from the North. Although his father was a Roman Catholic, his mother was a strong Lutheran, and the children were brought up in the doctrines of the Evangelical Church. The unsteadiness of the father caused the family to be continually on the move, and even with his death, adversity seemed loth to give up its prey.

Sigfrid's childhood was spent in a home of the greatest obscurity; but poverty often brings its advantages, and the almost cloistral life of the little children was fruitful in premature artistic development. School lessons were not at all agreeable to little Sigfrid, but his wonderful soprano voice secured him admission to a Leipsic choir in an edifice then known as St. John's Church. The boy seems to have become obsessed with musical notation, and the mother and sister encouraged his youthful attempts at composition. It was not long before his talents secured a promise of sufficient pecuniary help for their proper development at both University and Conservatoire. University life proved somewhat of a disillusionment to young Karg, and the Conservatoire studies threatened to extinguish completely his general educational course. Time was greedily snatched from general studies for the composition of operas and instrumental music. The practical study of the clarinet was also begun clandestinely. The reckoning day came, however, and his guardian withdrew his assistance.

He now became a fugitive from home, and, left to his own resources, he tried many methods of livelihood, ranging from the odd man about the farm to the playing of the oboe and viola in a miserable little town band. The queer combinations of instruments for which he wrote at this period brings to mind the quaint collections for which Elgar wrote in his period of 'Sturm und Drang.' The moral is evident—let not the young student despise or reject any of the limited choices of tone-colour which fall to his 'unenviable lot.'

for both Elgar and Karg-Elert are amongst the greatest colourists of the age. What a man of capacity really wants he will get sooner or later by the simple method of pegging away. Occasional engagements as pianist or organist widened young Karg's experience, but still more was the gain of moral insight from these hard times. The opera 'Ave Maria' and the Symphony in C major go to prove the thorough grip of instrumentation which he had even at this period. On free days Karg made for Leipsic, where the music festivals and the opera made the deepest impression upon him. His first feeling, he tells us, was a sense of great depression on realising his own smallness when thus brought sheer up against the great masterpieces of music. The town-bandship was now given up, and three years were spent at the Conservatoire under Wendling, Jadassohn, and Reinecke, his chief study being composition. The first ten Opp. belong to this period. He left the Conservatoire with flying colours, and although his chief apparent occupation was in virtuoso appearances at the pianoforte—for he always possessed an amazing clavier technique—yet he was obsessed of a craving for composition, which occupied all his waking hours. Still on the clavier, he worked his way through Liszt and Chopin to Schumann, whose Fantasiestück has exercised a continual hold over him. Through Schumann and Brahms, he went back to the two immortals, Beethoven and Bach, and at the age of twenty-three he was appointed an advanced pianoforte teacher at the Magdeburg Conservatoire.

An introduction to Edvard Grieg proved to be one of the chief signposts in his career. From him he first learned the true importance of composition as 'the expression of one's own independent personal feelings.' The Norwegian master pointed out the timidity of Karg's earlier attempts, the unsuspected plagiarisms, and directed him to a broader style of greater clearness and finish. Further study with Professor Teichmüller produced an even greater reputation as a clavier-virtuoso, and it was at this period that some enterprising entrepreneur, with astute initiative, insisted on the special value of a double-barrelled name. 'Elert' was added to the Karg, and Karg-Elert he has been ever since, willy-nilly. What marvellous powers these agents possess, thus almost usurping even the office of the priest!

Composition and virtuosity fought hard with Karg-Elert for the first place, but the former was destined to victory. Harmonic knots delighted him infinitely, and the more hopeless the knot the more he liked it. Every conceivable contrapuntal device he attempted, and like Max Reger at a similar period, his temperament and gifts of mastery led him to extravagance and likewise to an enormous output. Over one hundred songs appeared in the lists of various Continental publishers at this time. In many of these there is no mistaking his mastery of the tonal art and his power through it to express pure and noble thoughts. The pianoforte works of this period are less equal in value, many of them being subject to an exaggerated thickness of harmony and confused doubling which he may have caught from Brahms and Schumann; but the eight pieces, 'To my Swabian home,' woven round folk-songs, the three Caprices for four hands (Op. 16), the Waltz Scenes (Op. 45), and the first Sonata in F minor (Op. 50), are all very valuable works. The seventeen 'Aphorisms' (Op. 51) are of great beauty and of engaging interest, and in them he freely indulges his penchant for strange time-signatures.

The culmination of this period is reached in the second Pianoforte sonata in B flat minor, a work taking nearly an hour in performance. The MS. of this, sad to relate, has gone astray, but its recovery is fortunately not regarded as hopeless. For the rest, this period was filled with the numberless pianoforte compositions, Bach variations, Impressions, Schumannesque pieces, a Trio and Quintet for brass instruments, a Trio for pianoforte, harmonium and violin, and the magnificent A major Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte, a work which has become famous.

It was at the instigation of Herr Carl Simon, the Berlin music publisher, that Karg-Elert specialised on the 'Kunst Harmonium,' a highly-finished instrument of the orchestral type with one or more manuals. This province Karg-Elert speedily made all his own by continually playing in all the chief German cities and by writing a large number of pieces specially for it. The since famous Passacaglia in E flat minor for organ made its first appearance in this way. The mere mention of the titles of these pieces will show the lofty view he took of the possibilities of this new instrument—Aquarellen, Monologue, Scènes pittoresques, Improvisation, Madrigal, Sonata in B minor, Partita in eight movements, Fantasie and Fugue, Sonata in B flat, with double fugue on B.A.C.H., &c. He also, in a literary way, proved himself a strenuous propagandist of the novelty, and his various 'Methods,' 'Studies for the Harmonium,' and erudite work on 'Die Kunst des Registrierens: Ein Hand- und Nachschlagebuch für Spieler aller Harmoniumsysteme,' throw much light on the freshness of his views in organ colour, which later on were evinced so strongly.

So great was his admiration for the king of instruments that before he dared to express himself through it, he submitted to a rigorous discipline of technical studies, which enabled him to act as accompanist and soloist at St. John's, Liepsic. Then came a flood of organ compositions which are more than sufficient to show his perfect insight into the instrument and his great technical attainments at that time. A rearrangement, extension, and altogether free translation of several of the most successful harmonium pieces—the E flat minor Passacaglia, Variationen, Improvisation in E, Interludium in F sharp minor from the B minor Sonata, the Phantasie and Fugue in D major, the Canzona in G flat—was followed by the sixty-six Choral Improvisations, a wonderful group of pieces following on the Bach lines of procedure, but in every ancient and modern style and form. A strict canonic treatment is followed by a modern Fantasie, a free symphonic setting jostles against Toccatas, Trios, and modern Festival Marches, all being founded on the basis of well-known Lutheran Chorales. These were closely followed by twenty Choralstudien (Preludes and Postludes) and three Symphonic Chorales (Op. 87).

Commissions now began to flow in freely, and the name Karg-Elert soon appeared on the lists of Leuckart, Carl Simon (who has the largest number of his works at present), and many other Continental publishers. For Novello's, he has written the stupendous Chaconne, Fugue Trilogy and Choral, with Finale for brass and drums (Op. 73), the 'Trois Impressions' (of which No. 2 was the test for the F.R.C.O. playing in January), the 'Funerale' (Op. 75, No. 1) and its companion, Choral Improvisation on 'In Dulci Jubilo,' and last but by no means least the pianoforte arrangement of Elgar's two Symphonies, a veritable tour de force of transcription from the orchestral to the clavier medium. He has recently published three delightful Pastels, Op. 92, for organ (Augener & Co.).

[With this number we give a separate portrait of Sigfrid Karg-Elert. The article will be concluded in the March number.—ED., M. T.]

EQUAL TEMPERAMENT: AN UNREALISED THEORY.

We are all familiar with the visits of the pianoforte-tuner. During the process we hear him screwing and testing by sounding notes together, and when it is all over we are informed that the instrument is now tuned. But although musicians are familiar with the contradiction involved in the statement, the great majority of the patient public who pay the piper—if the expression can be employed in this connection—are totally unaware that the so-called operation of tuning consists really in systematically putting the instrument slightly out of tune. Of all the intervals that go to make up the tuner's scale, only one, the octave, is purely in tune. This necessity—we are almost tempted to say painful necessity—arises from the impossibility of twelve pitches in an octave providing accurate intonation for twelve independent diatonic scales.

A diatonic scale is a clump of intervals. It is best considered in this aspect rather than as a stepwise melody. An interval is the relation which vibrations at one rate bear to those of a faster or slower rate.

RATIOS FOR TRUE DIATONIC INTONATION.

C	D	E	F	G	A	B	C
doh	ray	me	fah	soh	lah	te	doh'
1	9	5	4	3	5	15	2
	8	4	3	2	3	8

These mathematically expressed relations represent perfect tune from a given keynote. The table next given reveals the fact that the pitches that will serve to stand for perfect intonation in any one key, will not serve for keys starting from other pitches.

THREE SCALES COMPARED.

A centre scale and a four-remove each side (four 'sharps' more and four 'sharps' less). 120 vibrations are assumed to represent C. The horizontal rules draw attention to differences in pitch.

D#	te	281.25	E	me'	300	E	soh	288
C#	lah	250	D	ray'	270	D	fah	256
B	soh	225	C	doh'	240	C	me	240
A	fah	200	B	te	225	B	ray	216

			D	ray	135	D	fah	128
			C	doh	120	C	me	120
						B	ray	108
						A	doh	96

This being so, we are faced by the question whether it is better to be in fairly good tune in a few keys and therefore to sacrifice seriously the intonation of the other keys, or to put up with all being somewhat out of true tune or, as it is described, 'tempered.' The latter plan is that which has been theoretically adopted in most 'tuning' since the days when John Sebastian Bach wrote his immortal 'Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues' for the well-'tempered' clavier. The particular form of temperament which spreads the error over all keys and favours none, is called 'equal temperament.' In order to obtain this equality, all the perfect fifths have to be slightly flatter and all the major thirds slightly sharper than they would be in strictly perfect intonation, and other intervals are consequently more or less tempered.

This then is the theory of attainment of the pianoforte tuner. We do not propose here to describe the exact procedure and rules in accordance with which the tuner works. It is sufficient to say that the process calls for the constant and accurate observation of the ear.

The important point is that although equal temperament is the ostensible aim of tuning, there are strong reasons for grave doubt as to whether this ideal is often reached. This failure of attainment is in many cases owing to the incompetence of tuners, and in other cases to an easy-going attitude towards the whole business and a belief that an approach to equal temperament will do for most practical purposes. Even first-rate musicians are content to acquiesce in this compromise of a compromise, and this fact may appear to be an unanswerable argument for the general acceptance of the results of the line of least resistance into which tuning has drifted. This contention is supported by the well-known capacity of the ear to accept, within certain limits, a relation of pitches as what it theoretically should be, rather than as what it really is. It is fortunate that this tolerance of the ear enables us to enjoy the performance of a full orchestra during which the intervals are rarely if ever strictly in tune. But if those limits are overstepped we become painfully conscious of the error. In the case of the orchestra we generally meekly put up with a cacophonous din that no ear in the world can analyse and we call it a magnificent climax, and in the case of the pianoforte we at once send for the tuner,—unless, indeed, we are in a young ladies' educational establishment where, the instrument being in use for many hours every day, the process has to wait for the holidays. Meantime——!

Can anything be done to alleviate the mischief wrought to ears by bad tuning? What qualifications have the 15,000 tuners in this country for their expert task and what authority has certified their competency? These are considerations we leave for another article.

NATIONAL OPERA AND ITS PROSPECTS: A REJOINDER.

BY HERMANN KLEIN.

There once was a scientist who was much puzzled as to the best way of laying hold of an octopus. He first tried the head; but that would not serve, because the head and the body were one, and together they formed the portion of the octopus that was least difficult to grapple with. There remained the tentacles. He tried to grasp each in turn, but found that unless he could envelope the whole of them at once he stood no chance of getting complete hold of the octopus. He then—no, he then abandoned the attempt!

I am rather reminded of this story by the procedure and the arguments adopted by Mr. G. H. Clutsam in the article which appeared under the above heading in last month's Musical Times. It was on the whole a very sane and conscientious effort to deal effectively with a puzzling problem. It began with an endeavour to find the 'head and front' of the business. The discovery thereof did not save the writer the trouble of picking up the tentacles—the slippery, twisting, bothering things—and trying to master them one by one. He simply had to go through the whole process, like all who have essayed it before him.

But did Mr. Clutsam really leave us any the wiser as to what kind of system to pursue if we would evolve a live, practical scheme for the establishment of 'National Opera'? Let us see. His main idea seems to be that we must first be provided with the operas that are going to be produced. A modern, up-to-date repertory, with nothing old-fashioned or classical about it: works 'untrammelled by tradition,' wholly original, dramatic, and English: above all, works that will appeal to the general public even at the cost of ideals dear to the composers—so long as the appeal prove successful.

In other words, if you are about to open a new department store, leave the building and the personnel to take care of themselves (they are sure to be all right!), and devote your chief attention to the selection and provision of the stock-in-trade. For it is with the 'goods' which you are to 'deliver' that you will catch your public. Does the simile sound a trifle commercial? Mr. Clutsam is to blame. The sacrifice of ideals, he says, 'may be bad for art, but it is an absolute necessity when National Opera is under consideration, for on the general public its establishment depends.'

So there is to be no attempt to educate, to cultivate a refined taste, but merely to amuse. The public palate has to be tickled, forsooth, because 'opera is the theatre,' and because the German opera-goer who pays for his seat 'evidently no longer desires to be educated when he seeks interest or amusement.' I am sorry to see that Mr. Clutsam's recent visit to Berlin for the production of his own opera (which won an emphatic artistic success) has left him with such a moderate opinion of present-day German eclecticism. That opinion may be perfectly just, but surely there is no need for us to take the Berlin standard as a guide when we set up National Opera over here.

Well, suppose we abandon the educational idea and give the public just what it wants; suppose our 'young' English composers get to work and try their hardest to write those operas (which are to capture the foreigners' fancy as well as our own) upon the excellent lines laid down in Mr. Clutsam's article; suppose that the 'half-a-dozen or so of these fine, entirely modern operas—text and music—are completed' (a mighty 'tall order'), I should like to know on what ground Mr. Clutsam arrives at the conclusion that then, and then only, our 'National Opera will have a proper foundation'? It will have a National repertory to start with, truly; but where will be the trained National performers, the National 'Stimmung,' and all the rest of the proper accessories for doing justice to these masterpieces?

Easier said than done. Mr. Clutsam treats the executive problem lightly. But there need be no fear. The question, Which is of the greater importance, the consideration of the repertory or the ways and means for its adequate interpretation? will never be seriously brought to the test. Should it ever be, there is no doubt in my mind that these two features are equally essential to the proper foundation of National Opera, and will therefore have to go forward together. But, I repeat, the question of their relative importance will never need to be settled—for the simple reason that the requisite quantity of 'fine, entirely modern' operas by young English composers are never likely to be forthcoming—all at once. New opera scores by the dozen may be had for the asking when production can be guaranteed. But the modern operatic chef d'œuvre which all Europe is to beg for, and which the Englishman's

'spirit of ambition' is to bring forth from this barren operatic soil (?)—for even one such example, I fear, we shall have to wait long.

And why? Again the reason is simple. Because throughout the length and breadth of the land we do not possess one solitary specimen of that primary essential mentioned by Mr. Clutsam—to wit, 'the first-class opera librettist.' It is very well to say that librettists must be found, that they must 'come fresh to their work,' that they must be 'informed.' Where are they?

How can Mr. Clutsam, who writes on this subject of librettists with absolute knowledge and experience, believe for a moment that we as yet have available in this country writers who will compare with the men who have made libretti for Verdi (Ghislanzoni and Boito), for Puccini (Giacosa and Illica), for Mascagni (Tozzetti and Menacci), for Wolff-Ferrari (Golisciani), or even Leoncavallo, who writes his own? I mention only these popular Italian masters because their opera-books are in many respects the best that are written; also Mr. Clutsam, after dealing sensibly with the great Wagner question, admits that these same masters (plus Strauss in Germany and Massenet in France) are the writers of opera for whom modern German and French audiences show the strongest liking.

But to talk of 'finding' librettists, as though they were to be discovered under a blackberry hedge, is surely futile. They must be created; or, rather, the 'superman' among them must be produced by some artificial method akin to that by which bees produce a queen. It must have been in some such fashion that Strauss evolved Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Assuredly there would have been no 'Elektra' or 'Salome' or 'Rosenkavalier' without this poet-author. But he did not come ready to hand. He was a poet with the genius for putting either drama or comedy into the shape required for musical and stage treatment; his savoir faire he owes to his association with Richard Strauss. The first thing to do, then, will be to search among our poets and dramatists for a genius of this type, and next proceed to develop him. Neither task will be easy; but it is the only way if we are ever to have a great English librettist.

In the meantime, says Mr. Clutsam, 'Schools of all sorts can be giving their students stage experience.' What in? In learning to do things they will have to unlearn? I fail to perceive wisdom in that; and yet the waste seems unavoidable if we are to begin by producing 'fine, entirely modern operas' of a type and calibre that no one can possibly foresee. I say rather let us have a single National school of operatic training for our National Opera (when it comes along), and let picked students only be admitted to it, to learn that which they will not have to unlearn—namely, the art of singing anything, acting any kind of part, and pronouncing their language so that everyone in the theatre can hear and understand them.

Wagner was speaking from experience when he declared again and again that his finest Bayreuth interpreters were those who had been brought up to sing in Italian opera. If we start our National Opera (whenever that may be) with singers who have received a solid all-round training, they will be ready to do whatever they may be called upon, be it opera to amuse, opera to elevate and educate, opera of the old repertory, or opera of the new.

Only, before all this can happen, one little proviso ought to be fulfilled: Our National Opera must be a solid thing. Whether founded by individuals or supported by the State, or both, its existence must not be at the mercy of public caprice or changing tastes for a period of ten years from the date it opens.

Occasional Notes.

As recorded elsewhere in our present issue, the Musical League successfully co-operated recently with the Incorporated Society of Musicians in giving a series of concerts at Birmingham. At a small meeting of members held at Birmingham, the future of the League was discussed, and in accordance with the rules it was resolved to place the whole situation before the members, and ask them to decide whether the League is to continue to exist. It is necessary to make this explanation in order to correct statements that have been made to the effect that the League is already dissolved. The main objects of the League have been to unite amateur and professional musicians for the promotion of the best interests of the art, to organize Festivals where and when the circumstances were favourable, and in so doing to utilise local resources as much as possible.

The two men of the moment in London's musical life for the time being are Mr. Thomas Beecham and Mr. H. Balfour Gardiner, who have separately conspired to give us an exceptionally interesting Winter season, the former with his German opera and Russian Ballet at Covent Garden, and the latter with his choral and orchestral concerts at Queen's Hall. The opening of Mr. Beecham's season was announced for January 29, with the first performance in England of Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier,' and March 8 is to be the last night. The following is the programme of the series:

Der Rosenkavalier: January 29, February 1, 5, 8, 12, 20, and March 8 (evenings), and February 27 (afternoon).

Salome: February 18, 21, 25 (evenings), and March 6 (afternoon).

Elektra: February 7, 10 (evenings), and 13 (afternoon).

Tristan and Isolde: January 30, February 3 (evenings).

Die Meistersinger: February 22, 26, March 3, 5 (evenings).

Russian Ballet: February 4, 6, 11, 13, 15, 17, 19, 24, 27, March 1, 4, 6, 7 (evenings), and February 8, 20 (afternoons).

'Die Meistersinger' is promised with a Bayreuth Festival cast, and the Russian Ballet is to introduce four new works to London. The conductors are Mr. Beecham, Herr Schilling-Ziehmsen, and Dr. Richard Strauss.

The Balfour Gardiner season is on the lines of that which took place last year. The concerts take place on Tuesday evenings, February 11, February 25, March 4, and March 11. The music will be performed by the London Choral Society under

Mr. Arthur Fagge, the Oriana Madrigal Society under Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott, and the New Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Balfour Gardiner as conductor-in-chief. The new works are the following :

- 'Before the paling of the stars,' for choir and orchestra Dale Grainger
 'The Inuit' (Kipling), for unaccompanied choir Grainger
 'Hill Song,' for wind orchestra ... Grainger
 'Colonial Song,' for soloists and orchestra Grainger
 'Christmas Eve on the mountains,' for orchestra Bax
 'At twilight,' for tenor and unaccompanied choir Grainger
 'Sir Eglamore,' for chorus and orchestra... Grainger
 'The cloud messenger,' for chorus and orchestra Von Holst
 Symphony in E major ... Frederic Austin

The remainder of the programme is chosen with a view to giving second performances, or first performances in London, of works that stand in need of such assistance. The first concert opens with Sir Hubert Parry's 'Symphony in four linked movements,' recently produced by the Philharmonic Society. The description of the work issued on that occasion is reproduced on page 95. The same programme includes Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on a theme by Tallis.' Other works in the scheme are Von Holst's 'The mystic trumpeter,' a new version of Delius's 'Lebenstanz,' Norman O'Neill's Introduction, Mazurka, and Finale, Dr. Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on Christmas Carols, McEwen's 'Grey Galloway,' Bax's 'In the faery hills,' and Bantock's 'Fifine at the Fair.' Altogether the series is a manifestation of extraordinary enthusiasm and enterprise on the part of Mr. Gardiner.

Meanwhile others will be working in the same field. The Edward Mason Choir announce a concert at Queen's Hall on February 27, with the following programme :

- 'The skeleton in armour,' symphonic-poem for chorus and orchestra ... Rutland Boughton
 Choral hymns from the 'Rig Veda' (third group) Gustav Von Holst
 'The Banshee' ... Leo France
 'Villon,' Symphonic-poem for orchestra William Wallace
 Marching Tune ... Percy Grainger
 Songs ... Percy Grainger and Coleridge-Taylor
 'Byron' ... Josef Holbrooke
 'Midsummer Song,' eight-part song, unaccompanied Frederick Delius
 'News from Whydah' ... H. Balfour Gardiner

This is an excellent list, which will reveal the younger British composer in both his grim mood of a few years back and his gay style of to-day. The choir is an excellent one, and the capable assistance of the New Symphony Orchestra has been secured.

Similar services will be done to British chamber-music by Mr. Thomas F. Dunhill and Mr. Josef Holbrooke. Mr. Dunhill has arranged three concerts at Steinway Hall on February 21 and 28, and March 7, the special feature of which is the performance of British works that are either new or have been previously given with success. The new works to be produced are a Pianoforte Phantasy-Quintet by Mr. James Friskin, Violin sonatas by Mr. Nicholas Gatty and Mr. John Ireland, and a Song-cycle by Mr. Ireland. Mr. Holbrooke, who has organized concerts at Steinway Hall on January 31 and February 28, announces first performances of chamber music by himself and Mr. Joseph Speaight, and first performances in London of a Clarinet trio by d'Indy and a Pianoforte quintet by Max Reger.

In the present year much activity will be evident among Wagnerian enthusiasts, and it is interesting to note that Spain, a country not usually associated with Wagner's name, is exhibiting considerable enthusiasm for the music-dramas. The Sociedad Wagneriana de Madrid is, of course, well-known in the Spanish capital. But in Barcelona there is an association known as the Associacio Wagneriana which has accomplished much good work. Much of its success is due to the efforts of Señor Joaquim Pena, a distinguished writer on musical subjects. As a result of the energy displayed by the members, the scores of Wagner's operas are now published with the text in Catalan, the predominant tongue in the north-east of Spain. Lectures were given during the first few years of the Society's existence. The various problems connected with the subject were explained, and practical illustrations given by singers of repute. This was done in order to attract the attention of the public to Wagner's music, and also to make it profitable for the young vocalists to take up a study of the works. It has been found a task of no small difficulty to obtain vocalists with the necessary temperamental and dramatic qualities. It is to those who are making their names that the enthusiasts of Barcelona look to help them to make regular performances possible.

It is proposed to celebrate the centenary in becoming style. Acts from 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin' have been presented from time to time, and it is intended to give more full and ambitious performances of the later works in the Gran Teatro del Liceo. The arrangement of these is a matter involving great difficulty, but real enthusiasm overcomes all obstacles. It is the desire of the Society to give every opportunity possible to the man in the street to become familiar with the views of Wagner. By performances, lectures, debates, and publications, a wise and systematic instruction of public opinion is being undertaken; and now that it is possible for those interested to buy the scores, with annotations and marginal quotations, and also the critical works at a modest sum, good seed is being sown.

Mr. Ernest Newman, writing in the Birmingham Daily Post, recently went into the subject of rag-time, which he finds is almost as old as music itself. He says :

The method is simplicity itself; it consists merely in varying the regular pattern of the rhythm by means of syncopation or an apparent perversity of accent. . . . Roughly speaking, the same effect is produced by emphasis upon a note that under ordinary circumstances would count for less in the rhythmic scheme of the melody than the other notes in the same bar.

He proceeds to quote instances in the music of Schumann, Handel, Beethoven, Tchaikovsky and others. But surely Mr. Newman is robbing the modern rag-time school of the credit of a real innovation? To how many of these unimaginative composers did it ever occur, in their vocal music, to put a stressed word in the rhythmically weakest position, such as the fourth or eighth quaver in four-four time, and to wedge it in, so to speak, with an accent and a tie? This device is now considered commonplace and mechanical. As we write, a piano-organ supplies an example :

SYMPHONY IN B MINOR IN FOUR LINKED MOVEMENTS (1912).

COMPOSED BY C. H. H. PARRY.

[This Symphony was produced at the Royal Philharmonic Society's Concert on December 5, 1912, when it was conducted by the composer. It will be performed at Mr. Balfour-Gardiner's concert at Queen's Hall on February 11, again under the direction of the composer, with whose kind permission the following notes are printed.]

I.—Stress. II.—Love. III.—Play. IV.—Now!

The sphere of Music is the expression of feelings, moods, impulses and emotions; so mere words will not cover what it means. Verbal labels of subjects and explanations of procedures cannot be exhaustive. Nevertheless some kind of suggestions are necessary to help hearers to follow the intention of any work dealing with external ideas; and a concise statement of what the subjects stand for, and their sequence, may be of service, with the proviso that they are only offered as approximations.

The four movements are linked together and the principal subjects, in various transformations, run through them all.

Brooding Thought:—

I.—STRESS.

No. 1.

in the presence of tragedy:—

wrestling with the meaning of it:—

breaking into revolt:—

The tokens of suffering and distress:—

The pity of it!—

The subjects of Distress and of Pity get entangled, and answering and driving one another on, arrive at a crisis, which induces the attitude of revolt, the Revolt phrase (Ex. 4) being frequently reiterated. The subject of Pity (Ex. 6) returns, but all is overshadowed ultimately by Tragedy (Ex. 2).

II.—LOVE.

In human love—

No. 7. Slow. pp Cl. B. pp Cl. &c.

lies the true hope of healing—human love calling and answering. But the brooding thoughts come back (Ex. 1), questioning the solution in view of the existence of hatred and indifference, and drive matters to a distortion of the motives of Thought (Ex. 1) and of Love (Ex. 7), and another crisis of vehement protest follows. But human love regains its hold (Ex. 7), and soothes the questioning mind.

III.—PLAY.

But not human love alone. The inextinguishable and inexhaustible instinct of humanity for play, merriment, gaiety, fun, humour, has its genuine province and its share in helping.

The subject of this movement—

No. 8. Vivacissimo. pp &c.

is a remote derivative of the motive of Tragedy (Ex. 2), and has for its attendant a panting phrase—

No. 9. &c.

which is bandied about in all directions by the orchestra, and for another phase of questioning—

No. 10. Cor. p &c.

a derivative of the subject of Brooding Thought (Ex. 1), and the part of the work which is devoted to this subject stands in the place of the section which was formerly defined as the Trio of a Scherzo. This is followed by a variation of the earlier part of the movement devoted to bubbling merriment.

IV.—‘Now!’

An intermediate discussion of the motive of Wrestling Thought (Ex. 3) by solo instruments leads to the motive of Content and Hopefulness—

No. 11. Moderato. p

which is a transformation of the motive of Wrestling (Ex. 3). But in human things tendencies overshoot the mark, and content leads to careless physical exuberance—and the consequent exchange of light banter. Upon this breaks in the motive of Distress (Ex. 5), and drives onward to a new crisis and pause. The motive of Hopefulness (Ex. 11) comes in a new guise, but is rudely broken in upon by conflicting thoughts, and after passing through phases of distortion is completely extinguished by the motive of Tragedy (Ex. 2), which submerges for a time all other considerations.

But that in its turn is completely transformed, and the recognition of tragedy in the light of human love becomes the token of healing:—

A new version of the motive of Hopefulness (Ex. 11) and various hints at other subjects follow, including at the end one glance at the transformed motive of Tragedy; and the circuit is rounded off by a reference to the motive of Thought (Ex. 1).

MR. T. TERTIUS NOBLE.

By W. G. ALCOCK.

To the majority of young organists the idea of a Cathedral organistship has always made a strong appeal, and to-day the attractions offered by such a position still ensure a goodly number of enthusiastic candidates when a vacancy arises. The ordinary man, having once obtained the coveted post, usually settles down for life, and there must be something about Cathedral work conducive to longevity. Many of us can remember more than one Cathedral organist, now departed, who carried out his important duties when considerably past the allotted 'three score years and ten.' But things move more quickly now, and the wider scope necessary for the organist, if he is to take any position in the musical world, has altered many of the older traditions. In the organ loft, as in most other walks of life, this is the day of the young man. To most of us, the position of organist of York Minster seems one of the most desirable of all such appointments, and it is difficult to realise that any other should be even contemplated. Think of the splendid Minster, the beautiful instrument whose measured diapasons roll reverberant ' . . . Such sweet, such sad,

Such solemn airs divine,'

a-down the glorious nave, the daily choral services, and the many associations which unnoticed entwine themselves into the life of the man privileged to officiate as chief musician amidst such surroundings! But these amenities of environment, however idealised to the æsthetic mind, afford little scope for the exuberant energy of the modern organist. The subject of this sketch is a typical example of the brilliant and versatile musician of which so many have been produced by the Royal College of Music during the last five and twenty years. Thomas Tertius Noble was born at Bath on May 5, 1867. In 1881, at the age of fourteen, he was appointed organist of All Saints', Colchester, and in 1886 he gained an open scholarship at the Royal College of Music. His later appointments were (1889) to St. John's, Wilton Road, after which he became assistant to Sir Charles Stanford at Trinity College, Cambridge; 1892, organist of Ely Cathedral; and in 1897 he succeeded Dr. John Naylor as organist of York Minster. In this year he composed music to 'The Wasps' of Aristophanes, for performance at Cambridge. He has been most successful as a composer of Church music, his Service in B minor having become a 'classic,' and the setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis being undoubtedly of very high merit. He has also written a sacred cantata, 'Gloria Domine,' and numerous anthems, organ, and violin pieces, &c. His music for the York Pageant attracted much attention, and was indeed a feature of that great occasion. His comic opera 'Killibegs' was produced at the Theatre Royal in 1911 with conspicuous success. Mr. Noble has a special aptitude as an adjudicator at choral competitions. His remarks on the various performances have been most helpful and always sympathetic.

But all this is an insufficient outlet for the remarkable energy with which Mr. Noble is endowed. When the idea of an appointment in New York was first presented to him some months ago, the difficulty of making a decision no doubt caused him much perplexity, and only during the past few days has he, while in New York, definitely decided to make the venture, and leave Old York for the New! His departure will mean a very distinct loss to York, for he has for fifteen years been in the forefront of musical doings in the Northern Metropolis and its surroundings far and near. As the Dean of York says (in an interview reported by the Yorkshire Herald), 'it is a venture.' But there is much in the future for a man of Mr. Noble's enthusiastic ability. His new position as Organist and Choirmaster of St. Thomas's Episcopal Church in Fifth Avenue, New York, will provide ample scope for his powers. The church is being rebuilt (having been burned down three years ago), and it is hoped that it will be completed in about eighteen months' time. There will then be a new organ, and there is little doubt that the new organist will be given a free hand in its design, while cost will not be considered. To an organist such a prospect is indeed tempting, and we can with every confidence foretell that the result of it all will be a great step forward for American Church music. It is understood that Mr. Noble has accepted a position on the editorial staff of Messrs. Schirmer, the music-publishers of New York, so that he will have no difficulty in filling up his spare time!

As an old personal friend, I can say that Mr. Noble will speedily make hosts of friends in his new career. His genial and cordial manner and overflowing enthusiasm for his art, with the highest ideals of all that is manly and true, are irresistible, and a large share of his gifts may be claimed also for his charming wife, daughter of the late Bishop Stubbs, of Truro, formerly Dean of Ely. The wholesome traditions of English family life will be well represented in a country where they are certain of a cordial reception.

We all wish Mr. and Mrs. Noble every possible success, and it is almost unnecessary to add that their life in New York will be watched with keen interest by their many friends in this country, who will cherish the hope that from time to time they may find it possible to revisit the land of their birth.

Grateful acknowledgment is made for the use of an article in the Yorkshire Herald of January 11, for information in preparing this sketch.

CITY ORGANIST, LIVERPOOL.

MR. HERBERT F. ELLINGFORD APPOINTED.

In our last issue we announced that the adjudicators of the competition for this important post had, after hearing fifty-seven candidates, unanimously recommended Mr. Herbert F. Ellingford to the Corporation Committee. We have now to state that after some debate, in which the claims of Mr. E. H. Lemare (who was not a competitor but whose great abilities no one would dispute) were inappropriately advocated by injudicious friends, the full City Council decided to appoint Mr. Ellingford.

The new organist gave two inaugural concerts at the St. George's Hall, on January 11. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, accompanied by members of the Council, attended the afternoon recital, and on each occasion there was a large audience representing every class of the community. At the evening recital the doors had to be closed some time previous to the hour of commencement, and many hundreds were turned away.

The programme was as follows:

Afternoon.

(a) 'Clair de lune'	Joseph Bonnet
(b) Pastorale	Max Bruch
Adagio, 'Kol Nidrei'	A. L. Peace
Romanze from first 'Sonata da Camera'

Evening.

'Le Prédication aux Oiseaux'	Liszt
Villanelle from the opera 'Marie Stuart'	Niedermeyer
Air with Variations	W. T. Best
Alla Marcia	Vincenzo Petrali

At both recitals the following pieces, which had been played at the competition, were also performed:

'Tragic' Overture	Brahms
Introduction and Passacaglia	Max Reger
Overture, 'The Hebrides'	Mendelssohn

Mr. Ellingford's executive powers and skilful interpretations made a highly-favourable impression both on the general public and the numerous organists present. The Max Reger piece was perhaps a tough morsel for many of the audience, but at least it served to exhibit Mr. Ellingford's fine technique. Hopes were afterwards expressed that he will soon allow his audience to hear him in Bach classics. At the close of the recital Mr. Ellingford thanked the audience for the reception they had given him, and said that he deeply appreciated the honour of becoming the successor to Mr. Best and Dr. Peace.

The Sheffield Musical Association announces a discussion on 'The institution of a universal system of fingering for all musical instruments' (meaning surely a universal nomenclature of fingering?) at the Lower Montgomery Hall on February 18, at 8 o'clock. How often this attempt to unify nomenclature has been made in vain! But hope springs eternal.

PRESENTATION TO MR. ROBERT HILTON.

Mr. Robert Hilton having recently retired from the professional staff of the Abbey Glee Club, the members presented him with a silver bowl and a cheque as 'an expression of regard and a mark of appreciation of his valuable services from 1884 to 1912.'

Mr. Hilton is now over seventy years of age. He was lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey from 1871 to 1911, and in that capacity his fine resonant voice and dignified style won the highest opinions from all concerned in the Abbey services. May he long enjoy the repose he has so richly earned!

Church and Organ Music.

THE LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL ORGAN.

As was to be expected, the colossal instrument in course of construction for Liverpool's new Cathedral has caused something of a sensation in the organ world. The chief criticism has been provoked by its great size, and to the unthinking, an organ of such dimensions may, at first sight, seem unnecessary for all practical purposes. But a large number of stops does not of necessity imply great power, and to those who can see beyond the actual bigness of the instrument the specification is undoubtedly remarkable for its variety, grouping, and mechanical resources. An excellent and exhaustive description appeared in the January number of the Musical Times, and from that it will be seen how admirably every department of tone-quality and power has been provided for. To begin with the true organ tone, the Diapason family, is adequately represented on each manual where such tone should be found, there being six of open metal on the Great, besides the two Tibias and the Stopped Flutes of 8-ft. pitch. In the Swell we find two 8-ft. Metal Diapasons, besides a Geigen, Tibia, Flauto Traverso, and Wald Flöte, all of 8-ft. pitch. The Diapason Stentor on 20-in. wind in the Solo Organ will no doubt prove itself useful in large bodies of tone. The Choir Organ is most interesting also, providing a complete family of 16-, 8-, 4-, and 2-ft. Dulcianas, the true Diapason tone of that department, besides an Open Diapason and a Violin Diapason of 8-ft. To follow the Diapasons to the Pedal Organ, we find no fewer than nine flue-stops of 16-ft. pitch, which should provide an ample bass to any manual Diapasons chosen. The Doubles throughout the flue-work are well designed, both in variety and wind-pressure. Those acquainted with the Albert Hall 32 Double Diapasons will know what to expect at Liverpool, and the Contra Violone on 6-in. wind should prove most useful, and an effective contrast to its larger metal brother on higher pressure. The three distinctive tones in 16-ft. pitch on the Swell will be noticed, while those on the Great will be equally effective in their position.

The mutation work generally should ensure a perfect ensemble of any tone-quality it may be desired to build up. Among the more delicate examples may be mentioned the families of Lieblichs and Salicionals in the Swell and the Gambas in the Choir.

The compound stops will add sufficient brilliancy to the respective organs in which they speak, and it will be noticed that besides the ordinary Mixture and Sesquialtera, harmonics are represented in Dulciana Flute and Gamba tone, while examples of the flat Twenty-first occur in the Pedal, Great, and Swell Organs.

The reeds are of course an important section of any organ of size, and from the splendid traditions of the builders, and the specification to which they are working, we may expect great results. The inclusion of a 32-ft. reed in a swell-box has recently been done by Messrs. Harrison at St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, where it is to be found in the Manual swell-box. At Liverpool it will be placed with three other reeds and five flue-stops in a separate swell-box. From its position and lower pressure it will form a contrast to the Contra-Trombone on 25-in. wind.

It is surprising to find but one 16-ft. reed on the Great, but no doubt its scale will prove ample, and in any case the Solo Trombas are within reach. The Swell contains a large and varied selection, including three 16-ft. of different scales and pressures. The five imitative reeds on the Solo, with the four high-pressure chorus reeds, make an imposing group; while the Clavier des Bombardes (Tuba organ), with its four stops on 30-in. wind, should give all that is wanted in power. The Tuba Magna on 50-in. wind will no doubt 'speak for itself.'

The Solo and Echo organs offer most interesting examples in their design. In the former we find a family of 'Violes,' including a Mixture, and a family of Hohl Flötes. The Echo Organ should prove most effective, and from its variety of tone and light wind-pressure (3½-in.) many delightful effects should be obtainable, while in combination with either Choir, Swell, or Solo by means of couplers, infinite variety is possible. The means of control over the five manuals and Pedal Organ are represented by every conceivable device, there being no fewer than 104 pistons, &c., which act in various ways, while the couplers and tremulants total 47.

It is truly a huge scheme, but when the enormous dimensions of the Cathedral are considered (its length is 460-ft., and its height 11-ft. more than that of Westminster Abbey), it seems difficult to urge any real objection to so complete an instrument.

It is commonly believed that men are employed constantly all the year round in painting the Forth Bridge, and it is not unreasonable to assume that the tuning of the 10,567 pipes at Liverpool will require equally constant attention (!), though the great space of the Cathedral will of course be of value in maintaining a fairly constant temperature.

From correspondence given below, it will be seen that Messrs. Willis's claim that this organ will be the largest in the world has not been allowed to pass unchallenged. The question as to what constitutes the largest organ is somewhat difficult to decide. There are not only pipes and their number to be considered, but wind-pressures, scale, and the rest. Then the Liverpool organ is to be divided, which makes any comparison as to cost impossible, as does the large predominance of pneumatic pistons, &c., in the Liverpool organ. As to the use of zinc, it has been proved over and over again to be equal in every way and superior for many reasons to metal, for the larger pipes. The fine Diapasons in Messrs. Walker's organ at Holy Trinity, Sloane Street, may be quoted in support of this.

In conclusion, it may surely be conceded that, all things considered, Messrs. Willis may fairly claim to have in their hands the largest organ in the world. Mr. Burn clearly lays undue stress on the actual number of pipes (contributed to—as they are—so largely by the Mixtures of the Hamburg organ); and if that constitutes size, he is no doubt right in his contention. But from what has been pointed out, there are other considerations which cannot be overlooked. In the matter of wind-pressure alone the two instruments cannot be compared, and though high-pressure does not necessarily mean noise, variety of pressure is surely of high importance. We in England fully believe that Messrs. Walker are foremost in their art in Germany; while we are convinced, no matter whether size or tonal quality be in question, that Messrs. Willis will produce an organ worthy of their great traditions and of the country which has produced so many of the finest organs of the world. W. G. ALCOCK.

We have received the following communication from the Rev. J. H. Burn, 'The Parsonage,' Ballater:

The claim that the organ which is now being built by Messrs. Henry Willis & Sons for Liverpool Cathedral will be 'the largest organ in the world' cannot be substantiated, either as regards the number of pipes or as regards the number of ranks. In both these respects the organ recently erected by Messrs. E. F. Walcker & Co., of Ludwigsburg, in St. Michael's Church, Hamburg, still maintains the first place. (1) The total number of pipes, including gongs, in the Liverpool organ will be 10,567; the number in the Hamburg organ is 12,260. (2) The number of ranks in the Liverpool organ will be 195; the number in the Hamburg organ is 215—or rather more, for in the case of some mixture stops containing various ranks I have been careful to keep well within the mark.

It is true that the Liverpool instrument will possess 167 as against 163 speaking stops in the Hamburg one; but the facts stated above are sufficient to show that such a method of calculation is apt to be fallacious.

It rather takes one's breath away to learn that in an organ costing £18,000 'all metal pipes below 4-ft. C will be of zinc.' In the Hamburg organ, zinc is only employed for the tubes of four large reeds, and no more than five stops are composed of an alloy containing so small a proportion of tin as spotted metal; the whole of the remaining 118 metal stops contain from 90 to 95 per cent. of tin, the total weight of which is about eleven tons. And yet the instrument, together with a magnificent case, only cost £13,000, i.e., £5,000 less than the amount which is to be expended on the organ (without case) for Liverpool.

The organ which was exhibited at St. Louis in 1904, and was intended to be placed in the Convention Hall, Kansas City, has now been set up in Mr. John Wanamaker's store in Philadelphia. This instrument contains, nominally, 140 speaking stops; but four of these, on the Pedale, are borrowed from various manuals. The builders state, in a pamphlet issued by them, that the total number of pipes in the instrument is 10,959. They have omitted, however, to make any deduction from what would be the total if all the stops had separate pipes! The correct number appears to be 9,931. The discrepancy is not a very serious one; still, it is just as well to be accurate when you can.

We have submitted Mr. Burn's letter to Messrs. Willis, who reply as follows:

The Rev. J. H. Burn's criticism of the specification of the Liverpool Cathedral organ published in the January issue, and his statement that a comparison of stop-knobs is fallacious, will in some ways react on the methods on which he bases his assumptions. These methods of comparison which he employs depend on the number and ranks of pipes in the organs, without considering the fact that since Liverpool Cathedral will be so very large compared with St. Michael's, Hamburg, it stands to reason that an organ of greater magnitude, as regards scales, wind-pressures, &c., will be required for the former building; and there is no doubt but that the Liverpool Cathedral organ will be the largest in the world in every way except in the numerical superiority of the Hamburg organ in the matter of pipes.

To make things clearer we will state the case in the form of a simile: 'A large locomotive for a narrow-gauge railway will quite possibly possess a greater number of component parts than the largest locomotive on a standard-gauge line, but no one will suggest that the former is the larger of the two.' It is precisely the same thing with the two instruments between which comparison has been drawn.

In commencing such a discussion, does Mr. Burn wish to prove that the Hamburg organ possesses greater power, greater variety of tone-colour, or is he considering it merely from a statistical point of view? If the latter, then he should not criticise until he is in possession of full particulars of the spaces occupied by these organs, and the scales, volumes of wind, &c., in both cases.

If he is criticising with regard to power, a comparison to be deplored, the wind-pressures are sufficient indication that the Liverpool organ will be the larger, as at Hamburg the pressures for both flue- and reed-work vary from 3½-ins. to 7½-ins.; those at Liverpool will be, flue-work 3½-ins. to 20-ins., reed-work 3½-ins. to 50-ins. This does not imply that the increased pressures are for mere noise, but they undoubtedly assist both power and quality of tone.

Taking the question of variety of tone-colours, the Hamburg scheme certainly exceeds all others in variety of mixture-work, containing as it does 71 ranks of orthodox mixtures grouped under 16 stops, besides ranks such as the Terz, Septime, &c., which are included in English mixtures, but normally provided with a separate knob or tablet in many large Continental organs. Liverpool will only possess 37 ranks of mixture-work grouped under 9 stops, but it is generally known that the majority of pipes in a mixture stop are of extremely small size, and the balance of stops at Liverpool will be of considerably greater size; and it is well to note that Liverpool will possess no less than 25 more reed stops (both loud and soft) than does the Hamburg organ.

This discussion emphasises the widely divergent methods of obtaining adequate power to support large congregations which are employed in Germany and England. While the German builders still cling to the excessive amount of mixture-work, a method employed to obtain power in the days before the introduction of the pneumatic lever about 1845, since that date English organ-builders have been able, by the proper development of heavy-pressure flue foundation and chorus reed-work, to give proper support with fewer ranks of pipes, and at the same time to increase the variety of stops available for individual use.

Mr. Burn proceeds to remark somewhat sarcastically on the cost of the Liverpool organ and on the use of zinc for metal pipes below 4-ft. C. It may interest him to know that there are, and have been for some time, good organ-builders in England, and that they have conclusively proved that hard-rolled zinc, with metal mouths, tips, &c., is not merely good, but is far better than metal for large pipes. Everyone knows that organ-metal is viscous (even with 95 per cent. tin), and when employed in large pipes causes them in time—however well they are stayed up—to become deformed, due to their own weight.

The extreme richness of metal employed in Continental organs is often detrimental owing to thin metal having to be employed, otherwise the cost would be enormous; and we have been informed by more than one Continental builder that he would gladly employ zinc if it were not for the absurd tradition prevalent abroad that the richer the metal the finer the tone; and also that the durability of zinc is questioned owing to the hard-rolled process being practically unknown abroad.

The question of thickness of metal is further emphasised by Mr. Burn's statement that eleven tons of tin were used in the construction of the Hamburg organ. He may also be interested to know that sixteen tons of the same metal were used in the Albert Hall organ, built over forty years ago, which is an instrument numerically far smaller than that at St. Michael's, Hamburg; at the Albert Hall the pipes are of spotted metal, i.e., about fifty per cent. tin.

Surely Mr. Burn is aware that under the existing conditions of labour, cost of material, &c., an organ of a certain size can be built in Germany for about half the cost of such an instrument in England; a perusal of the costs of recent large organs in the two countries will soon show this.

Mr. Burn has ignored the fact that the Liverpool organ will be divided, a process involving considerably greater expense, and also the vast difference in action-work needed in an English console where the pistons, &c., move the stop-knobs, as compared with that of an organ built on the Ventil and Kegellade systems, to say nothing of the greater plant required for generating the enormous volume and high pressures of wind needed at Liverpool for the heavy foundation and reed-work necessitated by the enormous size of the Cathedral.

Comparisons are certainly odious, but we may be forgiven for replying to Mr. Burn in fairness to the builders of both the St. Michael's, Hamburg, and Liverpool Cathedral organs, and close the subject leaving these two fine instruments supreme in their widely different schools of organ-building, being beyond proper comparison owing to the vastly different dimensions of the buildings for which they are intended.

BRANDON PARISH CHURCH, SUFFOLK.

The specification of the new organ, prepared by Mr. A. E. Chapman, organist of the church, is as follows:

NEW CITY ORGANIST OF HULL.

The Hull Corporation Property Committee recently recommended the City Council to appoint Mr. Berkeley Mason organist and musical director at the City Hall from January 1, 1913, at a salary of £100 per annum. The duties include the arranging of concerts. Mr. Mason has for some years been well known in Hull and district as an accomplished pianist, and he has been invariably called upon to act as accompanist to artists of national reputation at the principal concerts. A short time ago he was appointed organist and musical director of Queen's Hall Wesleyan Mission, and on January 6 he gave a recital in the City Hall, which, in one respect at least, was a revelation, as showing how effectively an expert in pianoforte technique can manipulate a modern concert organ.

Dr. Slater has recently resigned his appointment as organist of Calcutta Cathedral, after twenty-seven years' service. During this time he arranged the music for a great many State services, and composed a Jubilee Anthem for the Queen's Jubilee in 1887, and a Te Deum when the Prince of Wales visited India. Dr. Slater had a large teaching connection, which included the families of three Viceroys of India.

During the rebuilding of the organ in Ripon Cathedral full advantage has been taken of the opportunity by giving, besides the regular services, unaccompanied recitals of vocal music. A very memorable occasion was celebrated on Friday, December 13, 1912, when a series of Motets was sung by the highly-efficient Cathedral Choir, under the conductorship of the organist, Mr. C. H. Moody. A long and deeply-interesting selection was given, and the wide scope embraced is shown by the following list: 'Rejoice in the Lord,' John Redford; 'In divers tongues,' Palestrina; 'Sing joyfully unto God' (six voices), William Byrd; 'Hosanna' (six voices), Orlando Gibbons; 'My soul, O praise the Lord thy God,' J. S. Bach; 'Why rage' (eight voices), Mendelssohn; 'The surrender of the soul to the Everlasting Love,' Cornelius; 'A crown of grace for man is wrought' (five voices), Brahms; 'O Lord, my God,' S. S. Wesley; and 'The cherubic hymn,' Tchaikovsky. This is truly splendidly representative, and reflects the very greatest credit on all responsible, of whom the chief were the Precentor (the Rev. E. H. Swann), and the organist (Mr. C. H. Moody). The fine singing of the choir, of which the boys' voices are such a feature, attracted much remark, and Ripon is undoubtedly doing all that is possible to make the music of her Cathedral worthy of the high purpose to which it is dedicated.

Spohr's Oratorio, 'The Last Judgment,' was performed by the choir of St. James's, Whitehaven, on December 13 and 20, under the direction of Mr. George Tootell, organist and choirmaster of the church. The soloists were Master J. Lindon, and Messrs. J. McKee, J. W. Graham, and A. S. Graham. Mr. Tootell conducted at the organ.

Selections from Handel's 'Samson' were sung in the Baptist Chapel, Quorn, on Sunday afternoon, December 15, to a large congregation. The soloists were Madame Addison, of Nottingham, Messrs. F. Stork and T. Patrick, of Leicester, who efficiently sustained their respective parts. The choir ably acquitted themselves. Mr. H. H. North presided at the organ.

'The Messiah' was given in Consett Wesleyan Church, on December 18, under the direction of Mr. W. G. Lowrie, with Mr. J. E. Palliser at the organ. The soloists were Miss Dorothy Forster, Miss Ada Elliott, Mr. J. E. Jordon, and Mr. William Henry.

The eleventh annual concert of the Victoria Park Wesleyan Methodist Church took place on December 21, under the direction of Mr. Alec Morgan. Part-songs and anthems were given, accompanied by the organ by Mr. Allan H. Brown and at the pianoforte by Mr. W. F. Fenton-Jones. Organ solos were given by Mr. Brown.

The 'Last Judgment' (Spohr) was given at Hinckley Parish Church on Sunday, December 22, 1912, under the direction of the organist, Mr. Paul Rochard. The soloists were Masters Arthur Perrin and Albert Kirby, and Messrs. Walter Chambers and Augustus Kemp. Mr. Rochard played the organ, which was supplemented by six drums.

At the Halifax Place Chapel, Nottingham, on December 22, a selection from the 'Messiah' was sung under the direction of Mr. E. M. Barber. The soloists were Miss Warner and Madame Parkin, Messrs. Pearson and Asher. Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson was at the organ.

A successful performance of 'Elijah' was given at Chapel Street Congregational Church, Blackburn, on Sunday evening, December 22, by a choir of about eighty voices. The occasion attracted many listeners, and although the seating capacity of the church is 1,500, many were unable to gain admission. The principals were Miss Lillie Moffat, Miss Giggall, Mr. E. Dean, and Mr. A. Walsley. Mr. Thornborough, the organist and choirmaster, conducted, and Mr. Wilson presided at the organ.

On Sunday evening, December 23, 1912 (Russian Calendar), at 6 o'clock, Sir Frederick Bridge's 'The cradle of Christ,' a canticle for Christmas, was sung by the choir of St. Saviour's Church, Riga, Russia.

On Sunday evening, December 29, the choir, assisted by friends, gave selections from the 'Messiah,' conducted by Miss Mona Hudson. Miss Ethel Lord presided at the organ. This was admittedly one of the best musical evenings given by the choir, and great credit is due to Miss Hudson for her untiring efforts.

At the Barony of Glasgow Parish Church, on Sunday, December 29, 1912, a musical service was given, when carols by H. A. Chambers, W. G. Alcock, and F. J. Sawyer were included in the scheme. Solos were also given by Messrs. T. J. Salkeld and P. Howie, and Mr. A. Dinsdale, the church organist, played the organ.

Dr. Vaughan Williams's Carol Fantasia, and Christmas music by Sullivan, Gounod, &c., were given in Chigwell Church by the choir, augmented by the Ladies' Choir and some members of the Loughton Choral Society, on January 5. Mr. Henry Riding conducted, Mr. F. Simmons was the principal violinist, and Mr. E. Cuthbert Nunn was the organist.

A successful performance of Sullivan's 'Festal Te Deum' and a miscellaneous selection was given at Chagford Wesleyan Church, on January 16, with the assistance of an orchestra under the direction of Mr. C. D. White. The principals were Miss Beatrice Holman and Mr. J. S. Perry. Miss Jackman officiated at the organ.

The degree of Mus. Doc. Cantuar. has been conferred upon Mr. E. H. Thorne, the organist of St. Anne's, Soho.

The annual dinner of the Incorporated Guild of Church Musicians (founded in 1888) was held at the Holborn Restaurant on January 20, Mr. George H. Jellicoe presiding.

A recital of the organ music of Karg-Elert will be given on the Norman & Beard organ in the new concert-room at the Royal Academy of Music by Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull, on Wednesday afternoon, February 26. The recital will be preceded by a short account of the composer and his works. Dr. H. W. Richards will be in the chair.

The post of City organist at Wellington, N.Z., is vacant. Particulars are given in our advertisement columns (see page 75).

Reviews.

Charles Dickens and Music. By James T. Lightwood.
 [London: Charles H. Kelly.]

Mr. James T. Lightwood has delved with considerable success in piecing together the tangled skeins in the musical references to be found in the various works of Charles Dickens. Few English novelists have made more extensive use of music to illustrate character and create incident than Charles Dickens. We get quite an early Victorian atmosphere in reading of the popular songs of that epoch as chronicled by Dickens, and it may be added that these musical references are of the highest historical interest—reflecting, as they do, the general condition of ordinary musical life in England during the middle of the last century.

We may smile at the effusions of Silas Wegg, Captain Cuttle, Mrs. Micawber, young Wilkins Micawber, and Dick Swiveller, but it is helpful to have pointed out by such a cicerone as Mr. Lightwood the genuine sources of the snatches of songs quoted by these worthies. As to some of these sources, Mr. Lightwood is not altogether correct. For instance, the origin of 'Jim Crow' is inaccurate, and so is that of 'Yankee Doodle.' Neither is it true that the hymn-tune 'Belmont' is derived from Sam Cowell's 'Ratcatcher's daughter'—a glance at the historical edition of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' is sufficient to disprove such a statement. The tune of 'Believe me, if all those endearing young charms' is certainly Irish, while 'Oft in the still night' was as certainly composed by Stevenson. 'Buffalo Gals' is not an original Christy Minstrel song! It was composed by Henry Russell, just as 'The moon behind the hill' is another pseudo-Christy song.

'Oh no, we never mention her' was not composed by Bishop; it was supplied to Bayly by Crofton Croker. 'Isle of the brave and land of the free' is merely a variant of the concluding line in 'The star-spangled banner.' It is almost certain that 'Lovely Peg' is Arne's well-known song, to Garrick's words, in praise of Peg Woffington. 'My heart's in the Highlands' appeared in the 'Scots Musical Museum' in 1790, sixteen years before Captain Fraser's unsatisfactory volume, and is really an Irish air known as 'The strong walls of Derry,' which was printed in 1740. A similar origin must be sought for 'Over the water to Charlie.'

Taken all round this is a charming book, and is one that is sure to find favour with all lovers of Dickens. It will form an indispensable vade mecum for those who intend giving readings from Dickens, and will be especially welcomed by the members of the Dickens Fellowship.

Les Musiciens Célèbres: Haendel. Biographie critique. Illustrée de douze planches hors texte. Par Michel Brenet.

[Paris: Henri Laurens, Editeur.]

It is gratifying to find such an admirable volume as the present from the pen of the distinguished French critic, M. Michel Brenet. In a commendably brief Avant-propos we are given the raison d'être of the book; and the author acknowledges his indebtedness to the works of Schoelcher, Chrystander, and Streetfield, as also to the writings of MM. Volbach, Robinson, Romain Rolland, and others.

Within the compass of 126 pages, M. Brenet gives an excellent summary of the great Saxon's biography, and a critical appreciation of his operas, oratorios, concertos, &c. The genius of the French language lends itself particularly to striking criticism, and we are presented with a pen-picture of Handel as follows: 'Il est l'homme des chœurs monstres et des Hallelujahs écrasants, le poète musical de la Bible, un des prophètes de Jéhovah. Il subjugue plutôt qu'il ne charme, et l'admiration qu'il inspire se mêle de cette crainte sacrée dont les peuples sont saisis en écoutant le langage des oracles ou en assistant aux phénomènes redoutables de la nature. Il parle, et nous cédon's à son éloquence; mais les replis secrets de son cœur et de sa pensée nous sont fermés.'

M. Brenet does not shirk the question as to Handel's 'borrowings,' and quotes from M. Romain Rolland as to the two questions—namely, of art and of morality. Suffice it here to say that the author seems inclined to whitewash Handel, and he avows that the mighty oratorio composer 'transfigured and rendered unrecognisable' the very themes he 'lifted' from other composers. To add to the value of the present work there is a full bibliography and a catalogue of Handel's works. Moreover, there are fine portraits of Handel (including the statues at Halle and Westminster Abbey), and ten facsimiles of autographs, as also views of Chiswick, Vauxhall Gardens, Covent Garden Theatre, and the Foundling Hospital. The name of the composer is spelled 'Haendel' throughout, but British custom inclines to the form 'Handel,' especially as the composer became a naturalised British subject. It may be added that M. Elie Poirée is the general-editor of the valuable series 'Les Musiciens Célèbres.'

The Virgin's lullaby. By Ivor Atkins.

Serenade. By Percy Pitt.

Todes Sehnsucht. By J. S. Bach, with pianoforte accompaniment freely arranged by F. Korbay.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Atkins has deftly caught the spirit of the words of the ancient carol which he has set as 'The Virgin's lullaby.' His music expresses plaintiveness and religious simplicity, but its ingenuousness does not extend to the texture, which is wrought with subtle art.

Mr. Percy Pitt's 'Serenade' is similarly consistent with its text. It has charming accompaniment, suggestive of serenading, and a warm vocal outline. The words, which are given both in French (François Coppée) and English (Paul England), express the old, incomprehensible desire on the part of poets for amorous lingering in the woods during early spring. The music is, however, jubilant and hopeful, and the song is sure of effect.

Mr. Korbay, in bringing the accompaniment of Bach's 'Todes Sehnsucht' ('Come, kindly death') up-to-date, has steered between undue elimination of self and undue elimination of Bach. In this particular case the beauty of the music lies chiefly in the vocal curve—which, of course, remains. Mr. Korbay's version is a consistent and effective piece of music.

The Story of Music. By W. J. Henderson. (New edition.) [Longmans, Green & Co.]

Mr. W. J. Henderson's 'Story of Music' was first published twenty-three years ago. It purported to give, within a very little space, a survey of the main periods and tendencies of ancient and modern music. In this new edition (the 12th) the author has done something, but hardly enough, to bring the volume up-to-date. He does indeed tell the student something of the work of the later Verdi and of contemporaries like Strauss, Puccini, and Debussy. The information he gives about these is not copious, but it is reliable and capably expressed. The omissions, however, are notable. In his preface Mr. Henderson says: 'Only the works of those who have created new things in musical art and opened up paths to be trodden by their successors have to be studied in this book.' It is hard to see why, on these lines, there should be no chapter dealing with the modern song, and why the name of decided creative geniuses like Hugo Wolf should be omitted. And whatever economy of plan Mr. Henderson may have imposed upon himself, a book upon musical history cannot be so useful as it might have been if it excluded all mention of people like Brahms and the representatives of the modern Russian, Scandinavian, and Finnish schools. Within its limits, however, the book will be found serviceable to students who are anxious to make acquaintance with the rudiments of musical history.

Allegretto Grazioso, from the fourth Symphony. By Antonín Dvořák. Arranged for the organ by Reginald Goss Custard.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The name of Mr. Goss Custard is a sufficient guarantee that the arrangement is in all respects effective, and that nothing impossible is demanded of the player. So much cannot always be said of this class of work, and thanks are due for the skilful manner in which this charming music is brought under the hands of the organist.

'HIAWATHA' IN CANADA.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—In connection with a statement made by me in your December issue that Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' had not as yet been heard in the prairie provinces of Canada, Mr. Vernon Barford, of Edmonton, has called my attention to the fact that the 'Wedding-feast' was given in that city in 1911. Being in England during the Coronation season, I was not aware of a performance so much to the credit of the Northern capital. But when deploring the lack of an adequate presentation of Coleridge-Taylor's chef d'œuvre I had in mind the entire Trilogy of which the second and third portions more particularly convey the prairie atmosphere, while the first is the more characteristic of the Indian racial qualities. 'Hiawatha's Departure' was performed in Winnipeg, in a highly efficient manner, at the first Canadian Festival in 1903, conducted by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and selections from the earlier work (notably 'Onaway, awake') have been more or less rendered in the newer provinces since then; but a complete hearing of the Trilogy still awaits its opportunity.

ANNIE GLEN BRODER.

Mr. Claude Hughes, of Alberta, has also written to us to correct Mrs. Broder's statement. He says that the 'Wedding-feast' was performed at Alberta on May 18, 1911, with a choir of over 200 and an orchestra of forty-five. During this year the organization will perform 'A tale of Old Japan.'

MUSICAL CRITICISM IN PARIS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR.—While thoroughly agreeing with the comments of 'A Parisian' in the Musical Times of January on the unfairness and indifference of the French Press as regards musical criticism, I should like to point out that the Paris Daily Mail, for which paper I have the honour to be musical critic, prints unbiassed reports of almost every important concert given in Paris, irrespective of the amount of advertising done by artists. This is a new departure which was only inaugurated at the opening of the present season, so it may possibly be of interest to British musicians contemplating appearing in Paris to know this.

Yours faithfully,

C. PHILLIPS VIERKE.

Obituary.

We regret to have to announce the following deaths:

Mr. J. W. TURNER, tenor-singer and opera-manager, who died at his residence at Yardley, Birmingham, on January 17. He was born at Sutton-in-Ashfield, Nottinghamshire, in 1847, and was therefore about sixty-six years of age. Although he at one time deputised for Mr. Sims Reeves as a concert-singer, it was with popular operas, such as 'Maritana,' 'The Bohemian Girl,' and 'The Lily of Killarney,' that he was most widely identified. He had a most successful career as an opera-manager, even on the commercial side, and his power to cater for the melody-loving public proved that—under some circumstances at least—there exists a popular demand for opera.

AUGUSTE VAN BIENE, on January 23, the well-known violoncellist of the stage, who composed 'The broken melody' and acted and played in it over 6,000 times. He was born in Holland in 1850, and came as a child to London, where he earned a livelihood from violoncello playing in the streets until he was discovered by Sir Michael Costa.

Herr HEINRICH GERMER, the well-known pianoforte teacher and musical editor, at Niederlössnitz, Dresden, in his seventy-eighth year.

Canon JOHN JULIAN, the well-known authority upon hymns and their history, at Thirsk, on January 22.

Herr ANTON SCHOTT, once a famous tenor, who passed away at Stuttgart, in his sixty-seventh year.

Mrs. MILLAR-CRAIG, at Edinburgh, on January 17, after a short illness.

In our last issue we recorded the death of Mr. Albert B. Bach, of Edinburgh. We have now to announce, with much regret, that his wife, Madame Marie Bach, died early in January. We are obliged to hold over our notice on the late Mr. Bach's career.

COLERIDGE-TAYLOR MEMORIAL CONCERT.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL, NOVEMBER 22, 1912.

The accounts of this concert show that the gross receipts were £1,434 9s. 4d., and the expenses £435 13s. 9d., leaving as net profit £998 15s. 7d. Most of the receipts were from sales of tickets, but in addition to the generous support given to the concert by the members of the general committee and other musical friends, donations to the amount of £328 11s. 6d. were received. The following is a list of the donations of £5 and upwards:

THE MUSICAL WORKS OF DR. ETHEL SMYTH.

FOREIGN APPRECIATION.

In connection with the performance of works by Dr. Ethel Smyth, which recently created a sensation at Vienna, Herr Bruno Walter, who conducted them, thus expresses himself in the leading Austrian musical journal, Der Merker:

'I consider Dr. Ethel Smyth a composer of absolute originality and great significance, certain of a permanent place in musical history. Genuine musical productivity being a thing so rare, one is entitled to wonder whether this originality is partly derived from sex. If we had a hundred female composers, we might be able to detect some quality their work had in common, and distinguish it from that of male composers; but as it is our ears are wholly untrained to the perception of sex characteristics in music, and I am therefore unable to say whether there is anything inherently feminine in Ethel Smyth's work, though myself I am firmly convinced that an integral part of her melodic charm derives from this source. It is easier to speak of national traits; anyone can distinguish between German and Italian work, for instance, and Ethel Smyth's music seems to me to be typically English. But the greater the artist the more will qualities of sex or nationality be merged in individual genius, and in her case the gift is so powerful, the thematic invention so original, and the temperament so deep and warm, that such questions are beside the mark.

'I know "The Wreckers," the choruses "Sleepless dreams" and "Hey, Nonny No," and a quantity of songs. Recently, when performing the choruses, and "On the cliffs of Cornwall," I was glad to note the profound impression these works made on the Viennese public. And I believe their future success is assured and will be permanent; for hard as it is for genuine originality to make its way (what is really new must always repel at first), the best pioneer in Ethel Smyth's case for the eventual triumph of her strange thematic and harmonic invention is the really great and deep inspiration which feeds the stream of her melody, the irresistible persuasion of stormy passions, able, or rather compelled to utter themselves in music. This sort of inward necessity is a force bound in the end to prevail, and I have a feeling that Ethel Smyth is well on the road to full recognition.'

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS : ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The Conference held at Birmingham on December 30, 31, and January 1, 2, 3, was perhaps the most momentous in the history of the Incorporated Society. The central topics of discussion, opened by Mr. William Wallace in his paper on the copyright question and that of the registration of teachers, dealt with matters that seriously affect the body of English musicians; and the Conference was distinguished by a series of concerts, given in conjunction with the Musical League, that decisively established the importance of the British school of composers. In addition to the concerts and papers there was a programme of business meetings and social functions, the success of which again revealed the enthusiasm and solidarity prevailing among the members of the Society.

The duties of chairman at the various meetings were carried out by Mr. Landon Ronald, Dr. Cummings, Mr. Allen Gill, and Mr. Monteith Randell. The proceedings included a special service at St. Martin's Parish Church, and an organ recital at the University by Mr. C. W. Perkins. It was decided to hold the next Conference in London.

Below we give reports of two of the papers read, and of the four concerts. We regret that pressure of space and the necessity for full consideration prevent us from dealing this month with Mr. William Wallace's important paper entitled 'The musician and personal responsibility.' We defer a report until our next number.

THE ADVANCE OF CONDUCTING AND ORCHESTRAL PLAYING.

Mr. Landon Ronald, drawing from his wide knowledge and experience of matters orchestral, gave an interesting address on this topic, in which he summarised the requirements of a conductor and of the present state of orchestral playing in this country. He said that only in recent years had great conductors been recognised in England as worthy to be ranked among the most eminent in the musical profession, and that even to-day there were many people 'unable to differentiate between the man who wags a stick and the artist who inspires all those around him to feel as he feels and to do what he wills.' Fortunately, he said, the great vogue of orchestral music was teaching the public to understand the conductor's art. There were still some who believed that conducting was the last resort of the musical failure. He (Mr. Ronald) would endeavour to prove that this particular branch of art required more study and more natural gift than almost any other except composition.

Mr. Ronald outlined the history of conducting in this country, from the first experiments of Spohr with the baton at the Philharmonic concerts in 1820 to the final establishment of the method under the régime of Sir Michael Costa. He then described the essential qualifications of a great conductor. He said: 'First, he must be an all-round, thorough musician. Secondly, he must know the scores of all the works he conducts extremely well, and if possible by heart. Thirdly, he must have a good knowledge of the possibilities and distinguishing features of all the instruments. Fourthly, he must have an accurate ear and a good memory. Fifthly, his beat, besides being clear and decisive, must indicate in an intelligent manner the different effects he wishes produced. Combined with these are other natural gifts which are essential, such as magnetism, poetic feeling, a strong sense of rhythm, and above all, personality and temperament. Perhaps I should explain that in using the word personality, I mean that a conductor must be not only master of himself but of those under him, and must possess an indescribable something which impresses both his orchestra and his audience with a sense of complete mastery immediately he takes his place at the conductor's desk.'

Mr. Ronald remarked that great composers had possessed these natural gifts, but had failed as conductors owing to their want of control over the mechanical side of the art. Beethoven gave way to confused gesticulation; Schumann was similarly wanting in collectedness and clearness; Wagner probably suffered as a composer from his nervous, excitable nature. Mendelssohn and Liszt were great composers and great conductors, but the combination, Mr. Ronald said, was rare. He gave instances of famous conductors of the past and present who had composed nothing of importance.

Coming to the subject of orchestras, Mr. Ronald said that neither in the constitution of the orchestra nor in the art of orchestral writing had any real advance been made since the time of Wagner.

As regards orchestral players, Mr. Ronald said: 'We find an improvement in the Britisher that is as unique as the astounding strides that music has made in every branch in this country during these twenty short years. To Hans Richter falls much of the credit for the advance in the playing of the British orchestras, through imparting to them his noble and dignified readings of the various masterpieces he conducted. But in an almost equal measure we have to thank Sir Henry J. Wood for the progress made. He possesses a unique gift for training an orchestra and for conveying to them clearly his meaning.'

Mr. Ronald then paid a tribute to the powers of the London Symphony Orchestra, which were unequalled by any orchestra he had heard or conducted, although his experience embraced the greatest orchestras in Germany, Holland, Austria, and Italy.

He then concluded with some advice for young aspirants to conductorship. They should not shirk an apprenticeship such as comic-opera or seaside bands afford; and when they came to serious conducting they might 'begin with Strauss, Debussy, Tchaikovsky, and even some of Wagner, but let them beware of Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms until the very end of all things, and only when they have been years at the game, and when they are sufficiently master of themselves to forget their technique.'

THE FORMS OF GREGORIAN CHANT.

The following is a brief résumé of a paper on this subject by the Rev. H. Beveridge:

The Common Prayer of the early Christian Church was taken over, in its main features, from the Jewish Church. The singing of psalms, accordingly, constituted the main substance of the musical service, and from this practice of singing psalms most of the more important forms of the developed Gregorian Chant took their origin.

The earlier method of singing the psalms—which, in the Western Church, seems to have been used exclusively for nearly four centuries—consisted in this, that a soloist sang the verses of the psalm one after the other, while the congregation joined in after each verse with a kind of refrain. From this refrain—or response—of the congregation, a psalm thus sung was called a Responsory. As to its musical shape, the refrain, being congregational singing, must have been simple, while the soloist's portion probably showed a fair amount of elaboration at a very early period. In the Jewish service this singing of the psalm verses seems to have been characterised by a monotone rendering with ornamental figures at the end of phrases. The same feature is found in Gregorian Chant. These ornamented cadences, in course of time, showed two differentiated types, one based on the accents of the words, the other based on a literary form, which was in favour down to the end of the 5th century, and is now known by the name of Cursus. This form consisted in a peculiar arrangement of long and short syllables, one of the principal arrangements consisting of a word of three long syllables (with the option of the last syllable being short) preceded by a word ending with a long and a short syllable, e.g., corde curremus. After the 5th century this cursus underwent a change, inasmuch as the quantity of the syllables was neglected, and only the order of accents attended to. Thus instead of corde curremus we get, e.g., nostris infunde. On this form, too, a number of melodic formulae were founded.

The responsorial singing took place normally after the readings from scripture. Thus we find it after the Lessons of Matins and after the Epistle of the Mass. The whole psalm that was sung there originally, was, in the course of time, shortened, until only one verse remained. The form then was: Refrain—Verse—Refrain. At the same time, and probably as the cause of the shortening, there was a melodic elaboration of the refrain, presumably owing to its being transferred from the congregation to a choir of trained singers. In the Mass, at the Gradual, this change took place between 450 and 550.

The lecturer then went on to deal with the Responsorium, the Tract, the Antiphon or Antiphonal Chant, Mass Antiphon, the Offertory, and other forms of the use of Gregorian idioms.

THE CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The leading feature of these two concerts was one which of all the events of the Conference provoked the least contest of opinion. We refer to the playing of the London String Quartet (Mr. Albert Sammons, Mr. Thomas W. Petre, Mr. H. Waldo Warner, and Mr. C. Warwick-Evans). On all hands it was agreed that its purity, unanimity, and refinement, and warmth of expression could hardly be excelled by even the most famous Continental organizations.

At the first concert, which was given at the Grand Hotel on the evening of January 1, the programme opened with Mr. J. D. Davis's fluent and scholarly Quartet in G minor, which gained great favour with the audience. Later in the evening they were joined by Mr. E. Howard-Jones in a superb performance of César Franck's Pianoforte quintet. Between the two concerted works Mr. Howard-Jones played four pianoforte solos—'Noel' by Balfour Gardiner, 'Night fancies' by B. J. Dale, 'Legibet' by Ravel, and 'Jardins sous la pluie' by Debussy. Ravel's harmonies proved too ingenious for many in the audience, who incompletely suppressed their disapproval during the performance of the music. Miss Alice Lakin sang a group of tasteful songs, two by 'J. S.' and two arranged by herself. The accompanist was Mr. S. Midgley.

The second Chamber concert, given at the Grand Hotel on the afternoon of January 2, opened with Dohnányi's Quartet in D flat—the composer's masterpiece in chamber music and a work of which the London Quartet have made a special study. They certainly extracted its emotional content to the last drop, without overdoing the hysterical element. The remainder of the programme consisted of native music. Miss Mabel Moss, who has had a German musical education, accompanied the interpretations given by Mr. Mostyn Bell of four of her settings of German verses. They showed talent for the writing of refined and gently interesting music rather than for finding the musical expression of the poems. Upon this followed three short works for string quartet. Mr. H. Waldo Warner's Fantasy in D minor bears many signs of his intimacy with the string quartet style; its texture is elaborated without detriment to clearness, and its expression is reticent without loss of strength. Mr. Balfour Gardiner's String quartet in one movement (brought out at the Musical League, Liverpool, Festival in 1909) had a frank, rhythmic, and melodic entrain which bridged the gap between Mr. Warner's serious music and Mr. Percy Grainger's hilarious 'Molly on the shore.' This last work was readily endured.

THE CHORAL AND ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

On the afternoon of January 3, a choral concert of exceptional interest was given. It was a remarkably bold enterprise on the part of the Musical League and the Incorporated Society to import a choir of four hundred voices from Liverpool in order to give a performance of Granville Bantock's Choral Symphony 'Atalanta in Calydon.' As already explained in our columns, this importation did not imply any want of confidence in the choral resources of Birmingham itself. It was simply that as the three Northern choirs—namely, the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union (Mr. H. Evans), the Manchester Orpheus Choir (Mr. Walter Nesbitt), and the Gitana Birkenhead Choir (Madame Maggie Evans)—had already recently combined in order to give performances of Mr. Bantock's very difficult work in Manchester and Liverpool, there was, as it were, at call, a well-rehearsed and highly-capable choral unit that would afford Birmingham folk and their musical visitors an opportunity of making the acquaintance of a much-talked-of work by one of Birmingham's foremost citizens—an opportunity that might not occur again for years, if at all, so far as regards most of the audience. Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon' has at least one supreme distinction: it is unquestionably the most complex work for unaccompanied choral singing that has ever been composed. As in connection with the two performances given at Manchester and the one at Liverpool we have already described the peculiar construction of the work, we need do no more now than refer to the manner of its performance at Birmingham. As to this, it should be said at once that it was an extraordinary technical achievement, and again proved the marked capacity of Mr. Harry Evans in dealing with intricately divided resources. There are numerous places in the work where a rhythmic or a tonal hitch would have meant disaster. But it was not merely that the performance exhibited technical skill: it was an interpretation. Some of the climaxes—which make such exceptional physical demands on the singers—were superb. The tone of the choir rather lacked deep seniority in the bass section, but the sopranos were brilliant. It transpired that many of the male members were unable to leave their employment. The impression of the work made upon the large audience that filled the Town Hall was mixed: some openly declared their inability to find much to admire in the composer's treatment of Swinburne's poem and their dissatisfaction with the music, and others were greatly impressed by its originality, breadth, and intimate expressiveness.

The programme of the concert included Brahms's Rhapsody for alto solo and chorus, in which the solo was well sung by Miss Myra Dixon and the chorus by the Manchester Orpheus Glee Society under Mr. Walter Nesbitt. The choir also sang Elgar's 'Reveille' with considerable effect, but not so thrillingly as we have before heard this choir sing this remarkable piece. It was sung accompanied. The Gitana Choir, under Madame Maggie Evans, sang 'The exiles' (Laurent de Rillé), 'Sound sleep' (Vaughan Williams), and 'The Spanish gipsy girl' (Lassen), and displayed excellent training and expressiveness.

The evening concert was chiefly orchestral. It included light works by British composers, and served to show that there is in our midst considerable imagination and constructive ability, and power to write for an orchestra. The following is the full programme:

Festival Overture		.. Arnold Bax
Prelude to Act IV. of 'Othello' (first performance)		.. H. A. Keyser
Overture to a Comedy		Balfour Gardiner
'Three Songs of Unrest' (Mr. Frederic Austin)		Frederic Austin
Be not afraid (unaccompanied Motet in eight parts)		J. S. Bach
The Birmingham Festival Choir, conducted by Mr. A. J. Cotton.
Suite—'Beni Mora'		G. Von Holst
Song—'Cap and Bells' (Miss Carrie Tubbs)		E. L. Bainton
Six Variations and an Epilogue on 'Down among the dead men'		Julius Harrison
Comedy-Overture—'Doctor Merryheart' (first performance)		Havereal Brian

We cannot give space to a detailed criticism of this feast of new music. It must suffice to record impressions briefly. Mr. Bax's Overture was undoubtedly very effective alike because of its material and its use of the orchestra. The composer is one who appears to think his music in terms of the orchestra, and this may be said also of Mr. Balfour Gardiner, Mr. Julius Harrison, and Mr. Gustav Von Holst. Mr. Keyser's Prelude showed imagination, but it was difficult to realise the purpose of some of the music. Mr. Frederic Austin's songs, as might be expected from such an artist, showed thought and reflection of the moods of the poems, but it seemed to us that they would be more effective with a contralto voice than even when Mr. Austin himself sings them. Mr. Von Holst's picturesque Suite caught the fancy of a good part of the critical audience, but at the same time others, more strictly brought up, seemed shocked at the naughtiness of some of the harmonies, which probably would not parse according to, say, Goss. One of the best items in the programme was Mr. Harrison's 'Variations.' But the Epilogue is surely too long? It dwarfs the preceding matter. 'Dr. Merryheart' is an essay in tone-poem construction rather than an Overture. It contains many interesting features, but it imposes a difficult task on the listener, who is expected, apparently, to trace the musical illustration of many incidents of a fantastic story. One may easily lose count and admire the appropriateness of the music that accompanies the death of the dragon, and after all find that it is intended for a procession of heroes. Probably only Mr. Gerald Cumberland (who wrote the notes) and the composer really know.

The Bach motet was very steadily conducted by Mr. Cotton and finely sung by the choir. It gave such satisfaction that by desire it was repeated at the end of the concert. The conductors were Mr. Balfour Gardiner, Mr. Von Holst, and Mr. Julius Harrison.

This closed one of the most successful gatherings ever held in connection with the Incorporated Society, and incidentally it showed the utility of the Musical League.

OXFORD HOUSE CHORAL SOCIETY.

Early last year we put on record two strikingly expressive performances of 'The dream of Gerontius,' given by this Society at Bethnal Green and at Queen's Hall. They were an example of what is possible in the hands of a master choral conductor with unpromising material, for the East-End lacks the natural gift of voice and the tradition of choral style. Mr. Cuthbert Kelly has trained his singers into producing a most satisfying tone, and he has given them a high tradition. On Saturday evening, January 11, the Oxford House Choral and Orchestral Societies gave a performance of 'The Music Makers,' which made it clear that the powers of interpretation shown in the 'Dream' were no passing phase. The singing expressed enthusiasm for the poem and for the music; there was enthusiasm in the pianos as well as in the fortes. There was an intimacy in the reading that more than compensated for the lack of those climaxes of sound which a large choir and full professional orchestra can afford. With Miss Muriel Foster as the contralto soloist there was nothing lacking to give the performance full expressive significance. The remainder of the evening's programme consisted of solos contributed by Miss Foster and Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and of orchestral music, including Ambroise Thomas's 'Mignon' Overture. The audience showed unmitigated enjoyment. Mr. Kelly is to be congratulated on the artistic success of his labours and on the keenness with which it is appreciated.

DR. COWARD'S CHOIR AT THE 'COLISEUM' (LONDON).

The engagement for one week, December 30, 1912, to January 4, 1913, of this highly-trained small choir of about forty-five picked chorists at the Coliseum Music Hall, was a great success. Performances were given twice each day. There were some elements of doubt as to whether the fine programme of glees, madrigals, &c., announced would make an effective appeal to music-hall frequenters, who come mainly for amusement. Happily it turned out that the immense audiences of over three thousand persons that assembled on every one of the twelve occasions were very appreciative; but it would not be right to say that they were drawn solely by the repute of the Choir and a love for choral music, for the liberal policy that distinguishes the Coliseum management provided a remarkable number of other attractive 'turns.' As might be expected, under all the circumstances, the chief successes were gained in the lighter pieces, such as 'You stole my love' (Macfarren), 'Bells of St. Michael's tower' (Knyvett-Stewart), 'A Franklyn's dogge' (Mackenzie); but other pieces that made a more expressive appeal, such as 'Moonlight' (Fanning), and an 'Indian lullaby' (Vogt), and the trio for female voices, 'The Nightingale' (Weelkes), were also well received. Some selections from Elgar's 'Bavarian Highlands' Suite, accompanied by the orchestra, were also welcomed. If the Choir comes again, as may be hoped, we think it would be well to add some of the harmonized versions of folk- and traditional-songs that have been made by our best composers in recent years. Audiences are quick to respond to something they know. It is scarcely necessary to add that the execution of the Choir was always distinguished by the highest finish.

London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The Carol concert held on December 23 was in every way successful. The choir sang with enthusiasm under Sir Frederick Bridge's direction, and the programme evidently appealed greatly to the audience. Among the most popular numbers were 'In dulci jubilo,' Sir Frederick's own 'Ring out with jocund chime,' 'God rest you merry, gentlemen,' 'The first Nowell,' Barnby's 'Holy night, peaceful night,' and Stainer's 'Sweet Christmas bells.' The soloists of the concert were Miss Alice Wilna, Miss Edith Leitch, Master Jack Morgan, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Frederick Ranaflow. The usual New Year's performance of 'The Messiah' took place with full effect at the Albert Hall on January 1, under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge. The solo parts were taken by Miss Esta d'Argo, Madame Ada Crossley, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Robert Radford.

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The following was the programme at the concert given at Queen's Hall on January 9:

Symphony in C major	...	Schubert.
Prelude to Act 2, 'Die Meistersinger'	...	Wagner.
Comedy overture, 'The Pierrot of the Minute'	...	Bantock.
Symphonic suite, 'Scheherazade'	...	Rimsky-Korsakoff.

M. Safonoff conducted, and the fact that he was to do so attracted a large audience. The Symphony was interpreted with impressive power, and was especially made interesting on its rhythmic side. Bantock's dainty Overture, which calls for virtuoso-playing on almost every instrument in the orchestra, was also admirably executed. But the outstanding feature of the concert was a most fascinating performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Suite. Here the conductor showed supreme control. The audience was spellbound.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA.

The inclusion of Gustav Mahler's Symphony in E minor (No. 7) in the programme of the concert given on January 18, drew an overflowing audience. The performance was said to be 'In Memoriam,' the distinguished composer and conductor having died in 1911 at the age of fifty-one. Mahler's compositions have not been heard much in this country. One reason for this fact is that the most important of his works demand exceptional executive resources, and are of great length. This means much rehearsal and consequent expense, and behind it all there is the uneasy doubt as to whether the game is worth the candle. We are greatly indebted to the Queen's Hall Symphony Concerts directors for their enterprise in affording on this occasion such a favourable opportunity of considering the latter question. The Symphony is in three main sections, which are divided into seven movements. Guitars, mandolines, hand-bells, and other instruments not usually found in orchestras, are employed, and the work takes eighty minutes to perform. As an analysis of the Symphony is not possible here, it must suffice to summarise impressions, which in our case it must be said were much mixed. The opening section had some splendid moments, and others that were difficult to follow. Both the 'Nachtmusik' sections showed fancifulness and delicate colour, and to us—at this first hearing at least—were the most attractive features of the whole work. The final section, Rondo-Finale, presented many harmonic extravagances that painfully jarred and distracted. One could, however, feel a sort of subconsciousness of power and ardent vitality. On the whole the work induced the feeling that its thematic material was not of great musical value, and that most of the effects that compelled admiration were derived from treatment and skilful orchestration. The other items of the programme were the 'Waldweben' music from 'Siegfried' (Wagner), the 'Scottish Fantasia' for violin (Max Bruch), played by Herr Kreisler, and 'Die Meistersinger' Overture.

A memorable performance of 'The Messiah' was given by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society under Mr. Allen Gill's direction on January 4, in the presence of a vast audience. The capacity of this organization for large but well-graded effect has probably never been better exhibited. The solo parts were given by Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Helen Blain, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Robert Radford.

The Beecham Orchestra, fresh from its successful German tour, returned to the Palladium on Sunday, January 12, and gave a concert that put Delius's 'Brigg Fair' and Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'In the fen country,' side by side, to their mutual advantage. Mr. Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris' and songs given by Mlle. Victoria Fer added further attraction to the occasion.

The new concert-version of Planquette's melodious and deservedly popular comic-opera 'Les cloches de Corneville,' recently issued by Messrs. Joseph Williams, was performed at Queen's Hall on January 16, by the Central London Choral and Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. David J. Thomas. The audience was well-pleased with the spirited and bright-toned singing of the choir and with the work of the soloists, among whom Miss Carrie Tubb earned chief honours.

Warmth of expression and choral unity characterized the performance of 'Hiawatha' by the People's Palace Choral and Orchestral Societies on January 18, under Mr. Frank Idle's direction. The complete cycle was given, and a large audience displayed keen interest. The soloists were Madame Annie Walker, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Julien Henry.

RECITALS.

The first recitalist of the year was Mr. Cecil Baumer, the young and capable pianist, who appeared at Æolian Hall on January 4. His own second Sonata for violin and pianoforte proved a scholarly work and testified to the composer's fluency in musical direction. Miss Mary Law was the violinist. Senhor Vianna de Motta gave commanding pianoforte interpretations at Bechstein Hall on January 8. His programme included Liszt's Variations on Bach's Choral 'Weinen, Klagen' and Mozart's Variations on a theme from Gluck's 'Pilgrim of Mecca.'

M. Safonoff, the famous conductor, was heard at Bechstein Hall on January 15 as a pianist, in which capacity he earned considerable repute in his younger days. He co-operated with M. Beloussoff, a violoncellist of great expressive powers, in the performance of three Beethoven Sonatas.

The much-heralded Daniel Melsa, violinist, made his first appearance in England at Steinway Hall on January 15, and showed that the reports of his brilliance were largely based on truth. His programme gave no opening for exceptional powers of interpretation, but it sufficed to exhibit an advanced technique and a refined, sensitive style. Another violinist new to London, M. Alexandre Sébald, chose to distinguish his recital at Bechstein Hall, on January 17, by performing Paganini's twenty-four Caprices for violin alone. He certainly justified the stress laid upon the technical side of his attainments. Miss Floriel Florean gave an evening of South African Folk-Songs at Bechstein Hall on January 21.

Recitals have been given by Miss Catherine Robertson (vocalist), Mr. Maurice Warner (violinist), Mr. Claud Gascoigne (pianist), and Mr. Rowsby Woof (violinist), Miss Erna Schulz and Mr. Louis Edger (violinist and pianist), Herr Georg von Lalewicz (pianist), and Miss Tara Wallace (violinist).

OTHER CONCERTS.

The most momentous feature of the Twelve o'clock Concert given at Æolian Hall on January 9 was the performance, by the Misses Verne, of Reger's Variations and Fugue for two pianofortes on a theme by Beethoven. The most pleasant was Miss Edith Clegg's singing. The next concert of the series, on January 16, provided the rare pleasure of hearing Brahms's Trio for horn (Mr. A. E. Brain), violin (Miss Marjorie Hayward), and pianoforte Miss Mathilde Verne, finely played. Mr. Mostyn Bell contributed songs.

Miss Dorina Zingari, appearing at Steinway Hall on January 14, showed greater capacity as composer, pianist, and orchestral conductor than is usually expected in a girl of sixteen.

The Geloso Quartet, a new body from Paris under the leadership of Mr. Albert Geloso, made their first London appearance at Bechstein Hall on January 20, and revealed exceptional powers in a performance of César Franck's Quartet. They also produced a musicianly Quartet written by Mr. B. Holländer.

An excellently managed and popular series of concerts is in progress on Saturday evenings, at the Central (Wesleyan) Hall, Westminster. On January 18, the principal items in the programme were supplied by the Band of H.M. Irish Guards, conducted by Mr. Charles Hassell.

Mr. Russell Bonner has just concluded a series of twelve weekly pianoforte recitals at the Metropolitan Academy of Music, Forest Gate. At the last recital, the programme was selected by the vote of the audience from the 133 pieces played at the previous recitals. The public choice was as follows: Prelude, Rachmaninoff; Sonata l'athétique, Beethoven; 'Spring Song,' 'Duetto' and 'Bee's Wedding,' Mendelssohn; 'La Campanella,' 'Liebestraume' and 'Tannhäuser' March, Liszt; 'Papillon,' Grieg; Fantasia in D minor, Mozart; and Rhapsodie in B minor, Brahms.

Suburban Concerts.

The Richmond Philharmonic Society gave their first concert of the twenty-third season on December 12 at the new Drill Hall. There was a crowded audience which much appreciated a concert performance of Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis.' The soloists were Miss Clytie Hyne, Miss Violet Webb, Mr. Joseph Reed, Mr. Constantine Morris, and Mr. Wilson Brazier. Dr. C. E. Jolley conducted.

The Pinner Choral Society gave an interesting concert, under the direction of Mr. Claud Powell, at Love Lane Hall on December 14, with a programme in which the choral section consisted of Bach's cantata, 'The sages of Sheba,' six carols, and other Christmas music. The efficient and expressive singing of the choir and the excellent work of the soloists, Mr. Courtenay Morris, Mr. Claud Powell (vocalists), Mr. Claude Pollard (pianist), and Mr. Morton Stephenson (violinist), combined to provide a highly attractive evening's entertainment.

The Munro Davison Choral Society gave a concert on December 16 last, at the Northern Polytechnic, Holloway, and the programme included Elgar's 'Black Knight' and some madrigals and part-songs. The solo vocalists were Miss Maude Wilby and Mr. Albert Maiden. The fascinating 'Floral Dance' (Kate Mors) was given by nine contralto pupils of the conductor, who arranged part of the delightful accompaniment as a 'village band' for six male voices. The accompanists were Miss Maud Crouch and Mr. Herbert Hodge; Miss Jessie Bristol being solo-pianist. Carols and other examples of Christmas music were given at a free recital on Sunday, December 22, and owing to the almost total failure of the lighting, the music was listened to in an impressive twilight by a large and attentive audience. The solo-work of Mrs. Hollis, Miss Amy Knightly, and Mr. C. V. Waddington, delighted the audience.

The Streatham and South London String Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Sydney Robjohns, gave a concert at Streatham Hall on December 17. The programme included works by Bach, Beethoven, Coleridge-Taylor, Tchaikovsky, and Hamerik. The solo artists were Miss Violet Perrin, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Mark Hambourg, and Miss Ethel Robjohns and Miss Gladys Daniel played the solo parts in the Bach Concerto for two violins.

The best concert that Harpenden Musical Society has yet given took place at the Public Hall on December 17, when Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' were the chief works in the programme. Choir and orchestra numbered nearly one hundred, and many passages in both works were given with fine effect. The choir were heard separately in Balfour Gardiner's 'Cargoes,' and 'Night,' by Frances Dover, which received its first performance, and the orchestra played four pleasant 'Orchestral pictures' by Harold E. Watts.

Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' were performed by the Putney Wesleyan Choir in the Lecture Hall, Putney, on January 9. The soloists were Miss Mabel Todd, Miss Alice Booth, Mr. Harold Wilde, and Mr. Laurence Gray. The accompaniments were played by a small string band led by Mr. Edward O'Brien, and assisted at the pianoforte and harmonium. Mr. John Curran conducted.

A performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was given at the Borough Hall, Greenwich, on January 18, by the South London Philharmonic Society. The principals were Miss Lily Bruin, Miss Viola Doré, Mr. Frost Lambert, and Mr. George Baker. The choir and orchestra performed with much expression. The second portion of the programme included vocal solos and duets. Mr. W. T. Ward (of the Queen's Hall Orchestra) played movements from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and the concert, which was conducted by Mr. V. Bruin, concluded with a Choral Fantasia on 'Tannhäuser.'

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The most prominent features connected with the musical life of Birmingham in 1912 were the successful inauguration of the Midland Competition Festival in May last, the Triennial Musical Festival, and the visit of the Quinlan Opera Society; but in addition to these the past year was specially noteworthy on account of the visit of the most renowned virtuosi and vocalists now before the public. Choral music was well represented by our premier choral Society, the Birmingham Festival Choral Society, and by our amateur choral bodies, the Choral and Orchestral Association, the Midland Musical Society, and the Choral Union. Orchestral music and chamber music also found adequate representation, and in the way of miscellaneous concerts the number almost exceeded past records.

Before the close of the year two Town Hall Concerts were given, one by the Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association on December 21, and the other by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society on Boxing Night. The former revived Thomas Anderton's Cantata, 'Yule-Tide,' written for the Musical Festival of 1885 (which was especially rich in the production of new works, for on that occasion were brought out Gounod's 'Mors et Vita,' Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride,' Stanford's 'The Three Holy Children,' Cowen's 'Sleeping Beauty,' and Prout's Symphony No. 3). In addition to 'Yule-Tide,' the programme also contained Coleridge-Taylor's Cantata 'A tale of Old Japan,' which was heard here for the second time, and which again created an excellent impression, much care having been bestowed on its preparation by Mr. Joseph H. Adams, the conductor of the Society. The solo parts were well sung by Madame Aston, Madame Marguerite Gell, Mr. Walter Ottey, and Mr. Sidney Stoddard. The work presented by the Birmingham Festival Choral Society consisted of the fifty-seventh annual Christmas performance of Handel's great epic, the 'Messiah.' Dr. Sinclair secured a remarkably impressive interpretation, in which the choir achieved first honours. The principals were Madame Mary Conly, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. J. Stewart Wilson, and Mr. Hamilton Harris, with Mr. C. W. Perkins at the organ.

At the beginning of January the Incorporated Society of Musicians held their annual conference here, assisted by the Musical League in the framing and execution of the concert programmes. A detailed account of the proceedings will be found on p. 113.

The Birmingham Amateur Opera Society, who have rendered such excellent service in the past, were once more associated with the annual conversazione of the Midland Institute, providing as usual the musical entertainment, which this time consisted of a revival of Basil Hood and Edward German's comic opera 'Merrie England,' originally produced at the Savoy Theatre in 1902. The large lecture theatre of the Midland Institute was again the locale, the concert-platform having been transformed into a miniature stage, in a way to meet all requirements. Six performances were given in all, namely on January 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18. Mr. Franklyn Mountford had admirably prepared the work, and conducted a performance of all-round excellence, particularly gratifying being the splendid singing of the chorus and the fine playing of the orchestra. The cast of principals included some clever amateurs of considerable experience.

Mr. Wilfred Ridgway, a young local pianist of the 'Sturm und Drang' school, gave a pianoforte recital at Queen's College on January 16. He possesses remarkable power and makes plenty of use of it, to the detriment of musical expression; in the way of technique he achieves remarkable effects.

Mr. Joseph Cousin, of Little Hulton, has obtained the diploma of Fellow of the Royal College of Organists. The son of a miner, employed at Lord Ellesmere's colliery, he showed marked musical ability at an early age and obtained the L.R.A.M. diploma for pianoforte-playing when a boy.

BOURNEMOUTH.

A firm hold on public favour is still being retained by the weekly Symphony and Popular Concerts, the audiences during the Christmas season ranging at a high level numerically. Two exceptionally good performances at the Symphony Concerts were those of the fifth Symphonies of Beethoven and Tchaikovsky; in both cases the fine playing manifested the great care that Mr. Dan Godfrey had taken in the preparation of the music, and our conductor was nobly backed up by his instrumentalists. Kalinikoff's Symphony in G minor, Dvorák's F major Symphony, which to the disappointment of many was substituted for Sibelius's latest Symphony, and Brahms's second Symphony have also figured in recent programmes. Many interesting works in other forms have also been presented, those calling for special mention being Weingartner's 'Joyous Overture' (first performance in England), an orchestral version by Steinberg of Bach's Chaconne (also the first performance in this country), Percy Grainger's 'Molly on the shore' and Mock Morris for strings, and Dr. Walford Davies's new Suite (suggested by the poetry of Wordsworth). Turning to the soloists, pride of place must be given to the delightful performance by Messrs. Philip Levine and Cedric Sharpe (lately scholars of the Royal College of Music) of Brahms's Double Concerto for violin and violoncello; and reference must not be omitted to the performances of Hans von Bronsart's Pianoforte concerto, Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole' for violin and orchestra, Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, and the Mendelssohn Violin concerto, by Mrs. Davan Wetton, Mr. Anton Maaskoff, Miss Myrtle Meggy, and Miss Leila Doubleday, respectively.

The Monday 'Pops,' too, have afforded us many enjoyable and by no means uninformative afternoons. For instance, the first of the concerts to deal with the rise and development of various musical forms was given on December 16, when a very pleasant programme illustrative of the 'evolution of the dance' was essayed. A Grieg concert on December 23 was succeeded on December 30 by the twelfth concert of the series, which was designed to trace the 'evolution of the overture' (operatic); this proved to be one of the most successful of the season's concerts. The example chosen to exemplify the modern operatic overture was 'The Wreckers,' by Ethel Smyth (1906). This scheme, at the same time, well reflected the various types of musical thought and feeling as expressed in Formalism, Neo-Hellenism, Romanticism, and so on. The details of the remaining concerts of the series up to the date of writing are as follows: January 6, Scandinavian music (Norwegian Carnival, by Svendsen; 'Hamlet' Overture, by Gade; Norwegian Folk-song, by Halvorsen; 'Romance' for violin and orchestra, by Svendsen, played by Miss Gwenydd Powell, a local performer; Swedish dances, by Max Bruch; Overture, 'The Vikings,' by Hartmann; Norwegian Rhapsody, by Svendsen). It was a mistake, of course, to include the Bruch numbers in this programme, as they were alien to the avowed purpose of the concert. January 13, Italian music (Minuet for strings, by Boccherini; 'Anacreon' Overture, by Cherubini; 'William Tell' Overture, by Rossini; 'Dance of the hours,' from 'La Gioconda,' by Ponchielli; 'Lustspiel' Overture, by Busoni; 'Danza Piedmontese,' by Sinigaglia). At the twelfth Monday 'Pop,' Mr. Mauritz Speelman, one of the best musicians in the orchestra, played Rögister's Fantasia for viola and orchestra very charmingly. The supply of chamber-music items has comprised Brahms's Clarinet sonata in E flat (Mr. H. Oney and Mr. Montague Birch); duets for harp and pianoforte—(a) 'Scène de ballet,' by de Paz; (b) 'Le Soir,' by Chaminade (Miss Jacoba Wolters and Mr. Montague Birch). The foregoing artists are members of the Municipal Orchestra. On January 6 Miss Louise Hugsman played pianoforte solos, and at the fourteenth concert Miss Ivy Gray, Mr. Algernon Holland (of the Municipal Orchestra), and Mr. S. Cœlho very effectively disposed of three movements from Rubinstein's Pianoforte trio in B flat.

Of the miscellaneous events, not a few have been noteworthy, such as the orchestral concert at which Miss Kathleen Parlow appeared. At this concert, a more than usually promising vocalist, Miss Gladys Moger, also appeared. Then, too, the three days' visit of the Imperial Russian Ballet in 'Scheherazade' (Rimski-Korsakov) and 'Sylphide' deservedly created quite a sensation. Last but not least we chronicle the visit paid by Mr. Percy Grainger on January 11, this clever young musician experiencing something akin to a triumph with his performance of Saint-Saëns's Piano-forte concerto in G minor. Mr. Grainger also chose Bourne-mouth as the venue for the first performance of a new composition of his, a Romance for orchestra and harp solo, the composer conducting. Melody predominates, and it is of a very expressive nature. The results are obtained in a simple and unaffected manner, and the music is unfolded without pretentiousness or fuss.

BRISTOL.

On January 14 Mr. Percy Heming, who is a capable bass vocalist, gave a recital at the Victoria Rooms and afforded pleasure to a numerous audience. Miss Joyce Savage, pianist, assisted, and Mr. G. Herbert Riseley discharged the duties of accompanist efficiently.

The annual Ladies' Night of the Bristol Madrigal Society on January 16 attracted a large audience to the Victoria Rooms, and under the able direction of Mr. D. W. Rootham a carefully arranged scheme chiefly of the older madrigals was interpreted by a choir numbering 105 voices. The President of the Society (Mr. P. Napier Miles) was absent through illness, and his place was occupied by Mr. J. Barrett, one of the vice-presidents. Compositions which had not been sung in public by the Society for at least twenty years were given, and included the following: 'See where with rapid bound' (Marenzio), 'Hope of my heart!' (Ward), 'Shall I abide this jesting?' (Alison), 'O say what nymph' (Palestrina), 'Fine knacks' (Dowland), 'Here on the waters' (Lotti). These were all interpreted admirably, and the audience testified their appreciation. Elgar's 'My love dwelt in a northern land' was given with great charm, and so gratified the hearers that it was re-demanded. A short time ago Mr. Henry Daniel, one of the vice-presidents of the Society and a member for over fifty years, died, and as a tribute to his memory the choir sang Mendelssohn's 'In the bosom joy and grief,' which was an especial favourite with him.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

Pupils of Plymouth High School went somewhat out of the usual school music course in presenting at their annual concert a 'Masque of the Seasons' in costume, the musical numbers of which were odes, songs, and hymns, collected and introduced with much ingenuity. A further distinction was the attempt to produce the Masque under conditions of Greek drama; the costumes were draped in Grecian style, and the chorus occupied a platform in front of the stage, the performers ascending and descending by steps and mingling at intervals with the audience. Miss Potter, head-mistress, was responsible for the performance, which was highly creditable.

On December 28, the Plymouth Guildhall Choir gave their annual performance of the 'Messiah,' conducted by Mr. H. Moreton, borough organist. With the exception of occasional weakness in entry, the chorus-singing was excellent, though the holiday season interfered with the attendance of members and consequently with the balance of the parts. The principals were the Misses Doris Carter, Joan Ashley, Messrs. J. Perry, and J. Farrington. Mr. M. Alexander led the band.

Faithful to their intention of producing a new modern work at each of their annual recitals, Dr. Harold Lake (pianist) and Mr. Percy Lowman (violin) on January 14 at Plymouth played for the first time in England a Sonata for the two instruments by M. Crickboom, a Belgian, pupil of M. Ysaye and second violin player in the Ysaye Quartet. The work was unconventional in form and the themes were numerous and often fragmentary, but not without a sense of continuity. The almost unbroken use of minor tonality (D minor, B minor, and D minor) and the insistence on the tone of D gave the work a distinctive quality. There was throughout a suggestion of Debussy, without any actual reminiscence. The vocalist of the occasion was Miss Eileen Buck.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

On December 17, 1912, the Exeter Orchestral Society, of which Dr. Wood is conductor, confined their attention to works for strings only. Among the new pieces were Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris'; two 'Bagatelles,' by Percy Fletcher; a Mexican Serenade by Lachlan Maclean; and Ernest Austin's Variations on the 'Vicar of Bray.' An arrangement of the Andante and Presto from Mendelssohn's Octet (Op. 20) was also played, and Miss Mabel Pugh gave Bach's Concerto in E with the band. Miss Phyllis Archibald was the vocalist. On January 4, Torquay Municipal Orchestra gave a Wagner concert, with Madame Blanche Marchesi as vocalist.

The Wednesday Symphony Concerts have become a well-established feature of the propaganda, and are exceedingly popular. The conductor, Mr. Basil Hindenberg, is an enthusiastic and conscientious musician, and his interpretations are serious in purpose and enlightened by inspiration and intelligence. A Festival in April is being discussed. The Buckfastleigh String Band took part in a concert in the town on January 11, when musical plays and miscellaneous items completed the programme.

Aveton Gifford Glee Party contributed to a concert on December 31, for charitable purposes, and concerted music was played by Miss Pellow, Mr. Denton, and Mr. and Mrs. Reeves. In the evening of Boxing Day the choir of the Wesleyan Church in the same village sang a cantata, 'The Galilean,' to a large audience. At Newton Abbot, on January 9, two concerts were arranged by Mr. J. W. Furler, at which the Newtonian Male Quartet sang pieces, one of the most successful being 'Drink to me only with thine eyes.' Others who contributed to the programme were Mr. Furler (violin), Miss Janie Crews (piano-forte), Mr. C. G. Pike (cello), these three artists being associated in Mendelssohn's Piano-forte trio in C minor; Miss H. Furler (accompanist), Mr. Frank Webster (tenor vocalist) and Miss Olive D. Vicary (contralto), Mr. L. Bearne (organ), and Mr. H. V. J. Watts (piano-forte). A Welsh male-choir of railway workers from Neath visited Newton Abbot on January 11, and gave excellent proof of their gifts. Newton Brotherhood Band took part in the programme.

Three performances were given on January 14 and successive dates by Paignton New Opera Company, recently organized, of the opera 'Erminie' (Jakobowski). Mr. F. L. Harris, conductor, obtained excellent results both from the chorus and principals, and from the band, which latter was led by Madame Kate Cornish. Ashburton Operatic Society repeated 'The Pirates of Penzance' on January 15, the singing of Miss Fifi de la Côte being the chief element in the success of the performance, which was accompanied and directed by Mrs. Herring Mason. Between the acts, songs were sung, and Mr. Walter Herring Mason played Haydn Wood's new composition for violin, 'La vie de Bohème.'

CORNWALL.

A choir and band of seventy performers sang part-songs and choruses at Torpoint on December 17, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Greet. Old members of the Paul Hill United Methodist Choir, numbering forty-five voices, gave a concert under the baton of Mr. T. P. Pollard on December 26, Miss L. A. R. Taskis accompanying. The newly-formed choral society at St. Ives, trained by Mr. Ernest White, made their first appearance on December 26 in a programme of miscellaneous choruses, and showed that they had started in the right way. On December 31 Pool Excelsior Male Choir gave a concert of choruses and part-songs. Bodmin Vocal Quartet took part in a concert at Fowey on January 1; and Goldsithney Wesleyan Choir sang a number of choruses and part-songs on January 3 under the baton of Mr. J. Rees, accompanied by Mr. M. G. Phillips. Fowey Church Choir gave their services on January 8 in a concert at Lanreath, singing quartets, solos, and choruses. The first appearance after an interval of years was made by Padstow Choral Society on January 15 in a performance of 'The Prodigal Son.' A small band assisted, and Mr. Baker conducted a creditable interpretation.

Camborne Town Band report the purchase during the past year of new instruments to the value of £50, leaving a balance in hand of £5.

H.R.H. The Prince of Wales has given a trophy for competition among the bands of Cornwall at the next contest at Bugle. Mr. W. Uren is the bandmaster at Camborne. St. Keverne band gave a concert on January 1.

The programme of an organ recital given in St. Michael's Church, Newquay, on December 29 by Miss Wood included pieces by Best, Mansfield, Mendelssohn, Calkin, and Batiste. A new organ, built by Hele & Co., of Plymouth and Exeter, was opened on January 10 with a recital by Mr. John Hele and Mr. Alan Thorne. Marazion Ladies' Class sang pieces by Brahms and Schubert.

The musical play, 'The Wave Song,' which was produced at Liskeard last season, was repeated there on December 18. The author and composer, Mr. A. Venning, is a resident at Liskeard, and presided at the pianoforte. The performance was excellent, and the music made a good impression, the motif of the 'Wave Song' being clearly definable throughout the play. A crowded audience at Delabole listened to an interesting performance of the operetta 'Bold Robin' on December 26.

DUBLIN.

At the Royal Dublin Society the chamber-music recitals since the Christmas vacation have been given by the Motto Quartet (who played the Schubert Quintet, with Mr. Clyde Twelvrees); M. Edouard Risler, who came specially from Paris for this recital, and whose beautiful playing was greatly appreciated; the Wessely Quartet, who joined forces with Dr. Esposito in Fauré's Quartet for pianoforte and strings; and Dr. Walter Alcock at the organ.

The Quinlan Opera Company concluded a successful four-weeks' season on Saturday, January 18. 'Louise,' their principal novelty, was played three times; 'Tristan' only once; 'Hoffmann' four times. Miss Evelyn Parnell sang 'Traviata' twice with great popular success. The company ended giving 'The King' in May next.

During the month concerts of miscellaneous character have been given by Miss Lily Christie and Miss Molly Keegan—both prize-winners of Feis Ceoil who have continued their studies in London.

The syllabus for the Feis Ceoil to be held in the week commencing May 19 next has just been issued. The adjudicators include Miss Fanny Davies, Mr. Charles Victor, Signor Edgardo Lévi, Mr. Sidney Nicholson, Mr. Rawdon Briggs, and Mr. J. Ord Hume.

On December 6, 1912, the University of Dublin Choral Society, under Dr. C. G. Marchant, revived Schumann's rarely-heard 'Paradise and the Peri' at the first concert of this, their seventy-sixth season. Madame Borel sang the music of the Peri, and Mr. D. Jones the tenor solos.

GLASGOW.

The Western Amateur Orchestral Society, ably conducted by Mr. John Mactaggart, gave a very successful concert on December 19, playing with considerable effect Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, and Mr. William Wallace's tone-poem, 'The passing of Beatrice.' At the Choral and Orchestral Union's concert on Christmas Day, Schubert's Symphony in C had the place of honour on the programme, which also included Tchaikovsky's Suite, and the Overtures to 'Ruy Blas' and 'The bartered bride.' Miss Carrie Tubb, as solo vocalist, made an excellent first appearance at these concerts.

A popular item at the Saturday Popular Concert, on December 28, was a new orchestral suite, 'Cinderella,' the work of a local musician, Mr. G. T. Pattman, the organist of St. Mary's Cathedral. The composition, which is nicely conceived and daintily scored, was at once received with favour by the audience.

The custom of giving special musical services in the churches at Christmas seems to be growing, and it is worthy of note that the works of Bach are beginning to find their way into the programmes, although 'The Messiah,' as a whole or in part, still maintains pride of place. The Choral Union, under Mr. Verbruggen, gave their time-honoured performance of 'The Messiah' on New Year's Day and a 'popular' performance of the same work on January 16. The Young Men's Christian Association Choir, conducted by Mr. R. L. Reid, gave their annual 'Messiah' concert on January 3.

At the Choral and Orchestral Union's ninth Classical Concert on January 2, Mr. Philip Halstead, a clever Glasgow musician, was the solo-pianist in Schubert's 'Wanderer' Fantasia, with orchestra. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 8, and the lighter music included Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite and Dvorák's 'Carneval.' The programme of the tenth Classical Concert on January 7 offered some striking contrasts, as for example the Overture to 'Edipus at Colonus,' by Bantock (given for the first time here), and Haydn's 'Oxford' Symphony, Strauss's 'Also sprach Zarathustra,' and Schubert's Overture to 'Rosamunde.' The playing of the Scottish Orchestra at this concert reached possibly its highest level. The main feature of the eleventh concert on January 14 was the remarkably fine playing of Mr. Arthur de Greef, the Belgian pianist, in Grieg's Pianoforte concerto in A minor and Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte concerto No. 2, in G minor. Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony and Liszt's Symphonic-poem 'Orpheus' completed the programme.

The Wagner Centenary was celebrated at the Popular Orchestral Concert, on January 18, in an orchestral programme wholly drawn from the master's works, but the vocal numbers were songs by Mozart, Korbay, and Cowen! Similarly at the Scottish Celebration Concert, on January 25, the orchestral programme was quite suitable to the occasion, but the vocal items were by Verdi and Dunks! Such anomalies seem inexplicable. It is unfortunate, too, that the management did not include a Wagner centenary concert in their classical series.

At the monthly meeting of the Glasgow Society of Organists, held on January 11, Mr. Sydney L. K. Crookes gave some reminiscences of his personal association with Alexandre Guilmant.

GLOUCESTER.

The Gloucester Choral Society gave their second concert of the season at the Shire Hall on December 17. The chief items in the programme were S. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-Bon Suite' for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra—words by Thomas Moore; and Hubert Bath's 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' a Scottish rhapsody for chorus, soli (soprano and baritone), and orchestra. Both of these works were new to Gloucester, and received splendid interpretations. Mr. Charles Knowles, who was responsible for the baritone solos in both these works, made a welcome reappearance. Miss Dorothy Silk, who sang the soprano solos in 'Shon Maclean,' also gave a beautiful interpretation of Max Bruch's 'Ave Maria.' The band, composed chiefly of members of the Gloucestershire Orchestral Society, was ably led by Mr. W. H. Reed. Mr. A. P. Porter was at the organ, and the whole was under the careful conductorship of Dr. Brewer.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The Philharmonic Society rang out the first half of their season, on December 17, with Max Bruch's fine choral work, 'The lay of the bell,' which was first heard in Liverpool under the composer in 1879, shortly before he was appointed resident conductor of this Society. The work is well worth re-hearing, for it is melodious and scholarly, and contains some finely-wrought choral numbers somewhat in the Mendelssohn manner, although Bruch has a style of his own in the weighty simplicity of his choral writing and absence of undue vocal difficulty. To some who heard it after an interval of thirty-three years, the work revived old memories not unpleasantly. Schiller's poem is full of natural human interest, and Bruch's music is extremely suitable and often powerful, especially in its masterly orchestration. Under Sir Frederic Cowen's direction, the performance had commendable if not outstanding choral merit. The sopranos and tenors were somewhat weak in tone and attack. Mr. F. Ranałow delivered the important bass airs and narratives with sonority and judgment, and with him were associated as principals Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Teresa Amalfi, and Mr. Maurice D'Oisly.

It is generally agreed that the seventh concert, on January 7, was one of the most successful miscellaneous concerts ever given by the Philharmonic Society. To Sir Henry Wood is due the credit of the choice and performance of an exhilarating programme in which the powers of the splendid orchestra, led by Mr. Rawdon Briggs, were exploited to the full. It contained Chabrier's picturesque 'Rhapsodie Espagnole,' Balfour Gardiner's irresistible 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance,' Saint-Saëns's melodious Violin concerto No. 3 in B minor (skillfully played by M. Achille Rivarde), and third Symphony in C minor, Op. 78, which Sir Henry Wood presented for the first time here with great and immediate success. The reception of this work was a striking popular tribute to the thoroughness, enthusiasm, and inspiration of Sir Henry's method. The organ was in the able hands of Mr. Branscombe, and the pianoforte players, of which two are required, were Mr. Albert Orton and Mr. W. A. Roberts. The American baritone, Mr. Charles W. Clark, sustained his high reputation with the Prologue from 'Pagliacci' and 'An jenem Tag,' from Marschner's 'Hans Heiling.' Bach's 'Choral Sanctus' No. 2, in D, as a finale, came rather as an anticlimax to what had gone before, as the performance did not achieve distinction.

The news of the intended retirement of Sir Frederic Cowen from the conductorship-in-chief of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, which he has held since 1896, in succession to the late Sir Charles Hallé, has occasioned general and sincere regret.

The programme of the fourth Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra Concert on January 14 contained Schumann's second Symphony and some acceptable old-world music. The chief feature of the evening was the first appearance here of the prodigy boy-pianist, Master Solomon, who played Liszt's 'Hungarian Fantasia' with the orchestra. The clever boy is evidently being well-trained, and it is to be hoped that the flame of his genius will burn steadily to manhood.

The Sunday Society continues to provide commendable entertainments on Sunday evenings in St. George's Hall, for a very numerous class of supporters. The present season is the twenty-seventh of the annual series which the Society has held since its foundation in 1886. Theirs is a creditable record of good work, carried on in the face of very strong opposition now long-since outlived. In the conductor of the orchestra, Mr. John Lawson, the Society has an able and enterprising official, to whom it would appear that much of the credit is due for the high-class programmes and excellent performances. For example, on December 22, a very large audience listened with attention and evident appreciation to Mackenzie's Overture, 'Britannia,' the Allegro from Stanford's 'Irish' Symphony, an orchestral selection from German's 'Merrie England,' and Mr. Julian Clifford's melodious Pianoforte concerto in E minor, which the composer himself played with skill. The singer was Madame Eva Warren.

At the second concert of the Brodsky Quartet on January 11, a novelty was provided in Verdi's String quartet in E minor, an interesting example of the great Italian's strong personality in an unusual medium; César Franck's fine Quintet (in which the able pianist was Mr. Fred Blundell); and the Mozart Quartet in F (K. 590).

The second half of the Rodewald Concert Club's season commenced in the 'Bear's Paw' music-room on January 13, when Mr. Vivian Burrows again displayed his virile powers as a violinist. Miss Gladys Lederer gave pleasure by her singing, and Mr. Herbert Blenkarn was a tactful accompanist. An interesting recital was given in the Vamen Rooms by Mr. Fred Blundell (pianoforte) and Mr. T. B. Sidebottom (violin) on January 15.

At the Repertory Theatre, 'Fifinella,' which is described as a 'Fairy Frolic in three acts and some pantomime,' was produced on December 26, and since has been received with popular favour. This whimsical and amusing piece is designed by Messrs. Barry Jackson and Basil Dean, with lyrics by the former. The incidental music, composed by Mr. Norman Hayes, is distinctly good of its kind, and is effectively scored.

Commencing on December 23, the Moody-Manners Opera Company completed a highly successful four weeks' season in Kelly's Theatre. Full houses were almost invariably the rule, and testified to Mr. Manners's enterprise and wisdom in providing adequate representations of well-known works at popular prices, ranging from a fourpenny gallery to half-a-crown stalls. 'Elijah' on the stage continues a favourite 'opera,' rivalling in favour the well-worn 'Faust,' 'Lily of Killarney,' and 'Bohemian Girl.' Mr. Manners also revived Gounod's 'Romeo and Juliet' and Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah.'

A performance of the 'Messiah' was given in the Auditorium by the Port Sunlight Philharmonic Chorus and Orchestra on December 19, conducted by Mr. Seddon. The vocal principals were Miss Louise James, Miss Eunice Grounds, Mr. Albert Holt, and Mr. George Parker, with Mr. J. E. Matthews as leader. The large choir included volunteers from the leading choral Societies in Liverpool and neighbourhood. According to the printed programme the aim of the Society is to 'perpetuate year by year the most sublime oratorio ever written, and to do honour to the name of its immortal creator.'

At the concert of the Oxtown and Claughton Orchestral Society, held in the Birkenhead Town Hall, December 21, Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture, and Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite were played under the careful direction of Mr. J. E. Matthews. The Society continues to uphold a high standard. It was unwise, however, to play Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, with a young soloist at tenor unequal to the task. An interesting selection of tenor songs was sung by Mr. Roland Jackson, ably accompanied by Mrs. A. C. Bamford.

The Waterloo Amateur Operatic Society, one of the best local amateur organizations of its kind, gave three good performances of Sullivan's 'Iolanthe,' with orchestra, in the Waterloo Town Hall, under the able direction of Mr. George F. Mason.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Although the results of the Hallé Treasurer's appeal to the guarantors and subscribers will probably not be known before the end of the season, indications are not wanting that the response will not be such as he would desire. During the year-end recess two letters from guarantors appeared in the columns of the Guardian, and very plainly told the executive that it was quite useless to appeal for help to the outside public and yet retain the same control as before; if the public pays it must have a voice, or voices on the governing body. On this point there appears to have been divided opinions and a hesitating pronouncement even at the special meeting last December. If the executive is unwilling or unable to realise this very elementary fact the sooner it perishes the better; the idea of asking public-spirited citizens to help in the financing of a privately-controlled society not unnaturally leads to responses accompanied by restrictive conditions. There is only one way out of this dilemma, and so far the executive has hesitated to permit this admission of supplementary public opinion. The logic of facts, however, is inexorable, and the end of the season must witness a definite re-modelling of the whole business. Everyone realises that Balling has a difficult task on hand. He is finding it impossible to adhere to his bold scheme of new works; the reason can only be conjectured, but he has been compelled to jettison some of his cargo. At the time of writing there remain but five orchestral concerts, at which there appears small likelihood of ten or a dozen promised works being performed. Other Societies here and elsewhere find it possible to adhere to the programmes outlined at the beginning of the season, but, apart from the choral nights, hardly one Hallé programme this season has been in accordance with the prospectus published last October.

The tale of recent Hallé concerts is soon told. Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music in its entirety, and the 'Messiah,' call for no comment. The early New Year concert (January 9) brought Achille Rivarde in the Beethoven Violin concerto and Bach Chaconne, Balling introducing a Roger Ducasse Suite that proved to be little more than modernised Delibes; really, after hearing the work of the young English school at Birmingham on January 3 and 4, and comparing it with that of Mandl, Bleye, Klose, Charpentier, Volkmann, and Ducasse, played here by Balling since October, it must be said that these Continental men are not in the hunt either in freshness of ideas or in their expression. As Balling heard all the Birmingham novelties, no doubt he too came to pretty definite conclusions on this matter. On January 16 he played a Suite of four 'Musical Pictures' by J. H. Foulds, one of the 'cellists of the Hallé band (his father was formerly leading bassoon player here). Inspiration has been drawn (the composer frankly explains) from four paintings: (1) by William Blake (hung in the Whitworth Gallery here) called 'The Ancient of Days,' (2) a Brunet, 'Colombine,' seen in the Paris Salon of 1906, (3) a sketch, 'Old Greek legend,' by the artist Martin, and (4) Boutigny's 'Tocsin,' a picture of martial life in a small mediæval French town. Here were first-rate ideas, expressed with compelling power, freshness of thought and outlook both in design and colour. Heard immediately after a paltry and dreary Volkmann Symphony, it proved indeed 'refreshing fruit.' The 'Zarathustra' reading which followed showed Balling's conducting in its finest light; although the work had not been rehearsed very much it had a freedom and élan not hitherto discernible in Hallé interpretations. Busoni's absence, owing to serious illness, was a great disappointment, doubtless shared by his admirers also in Liverpool and Bradford. Miss Doris Woodall (vocalist), appeared in his place.

Both the Speelman and Brand Lane orchestral Saturday 'Proms,' go on their way rejoicing in crowded houses. The composition of the audiences must afford the liveliest satisfaction to those who can look ahead five or ten years; people are going to these Saturday 'Proms,' who would not look twice at a Hallé programme. The situation is very analogous to that of the Competitive Festival movement; there it has been clearly demonstrated that the great B.P. won't 'shy' at music drawn from what we call the 'classics' any more than it will from that of the moderns. A Liszt Pianoforte concerto (E major) was so rapturously encored the other Saturday night that the pianist (Miss Morvay) was convinced the crowd wanted the whole affair again, and besought Sir Henry Wood to allow her to play it a second time in its entirety! The pity is that years ago the Hallé executive did not realise the potentialities of 'feeding' their Thursday audiences by themselves entering the field of popular Saturday programmes, and thus fostering the desire for the better and bigger orchestral works suitable only at a Hallé concert. Others have now exploited this field, and naturally will endeavour to keep their own clientèle. Six years ago there was only one orchestra in Manchester. Now we have three!

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

Swedish, Russian, Danish, Scottish, and Northumbrian folk-songs were sung unaccompanied at the Classical Concert Society's meeting on January 10 by the Folk-song Quartet—Misses Beatrice Spencer and Florence Oliver, and Messrs. Louis Godfrey and A. Foxton Ferguson. Their singing was well-balanced and expressive, the whole aim of the vocalists being to make their ensemble more important than mere personal display, and to present their material in the most finished way possible. They also sang charmingly four songs from Dr. Ernest Walker's dainty 'England's Helicon,' and Brahms's 'Liebeslieder Walzer.' The latter were accompanied by Messrs. E. L. Bainton and W. G. Whittaker, who also contributed two pianoforte duets, the first three movements of Schubert's Grand Duo, Op. 140, and Brahms's 'Variations on a theme of Schumann.'

SHEFFIELD.

The newly formed Sheffield Musical Association was responsible for an interesting concert-lecture, given in the Montgomery Hall on January 14. Dr. McClure chose for his subject 'The growth of the Overture.' His admirably compiled and delivered address was partly historical, and for the rest, analytical, his remarks in the latter connection being excellently illustrated by a string orchestra.

Another concert-lecture given two days afterwards dealt with the subject of 'Wagner and Music-drama,' the lecturer being Mr. J. A. Rodgers. The development of Wagner's harmonic and melodic idiom was the particular line followed by the speaker. A number of well-sung musical illustrations embraced the whole of the Wagner stage works from 'Rienzi' to 'Parsifal.'

The St. Andrew's Choral Society which Mr. O. C. Owrid enthusiastically conducts gave a successful concert on January 18. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast,' and Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' found the choir in confident mood and well-prepared condition. Their migration to a larger hall has braced up both membership and singing.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

AYR.—On December 19 the Ayr Choral Union, assisted by the Scottish Orchestra, gave a very praiseworthy performance of Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' under the conductorship of Mr. Wilfrid E. Senior. The second part of the programme (purely orchestral) was conducted by Mr. Mlynarski, of the Scottish Orchestra. The Town Hall was filled to overflowing by a most enthusiastic audience.

CARLISLE.—The Choral Society, at their annual concert on January 16, gave the first performance in this city of 'A tale of Old Japan,' which attracted a large and appreciative audience. An excellent interpretation of the work was secured under Mr. Darley's conductorship by the principals and choir. The former were Miss Lilian Dillingham, Miss Margaret Birch, a native of this city, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. William Hayle. An Entr'acte for strings by Mr. H. V. French, a local amateur, was received with great favour, and Mr. Theo Crozier (also a local musician) roused enthusiasm with his violin-playing.

CHICHESTER.—The fourteenth concert of the Chichester Orchestral Society took place on January 20, and again exemplified the high efficiency which this body has attained under the enthusiastic guidance of Mr. F. J. W. Crowe. Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, Elgar's 'Sursum Corda,' Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture, and Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' Suite were the chief orchestral numbers. Miss Isobel Hirschfeld played the first movement of Rubinstein's fourth Pianoforte Concerto, and Mr. Dalton Baker sang songs by Mr. Easthope Martin, accompanied by the composer.

CHRISTCHURCH (N.Z.).—At a concert of the Musical Union, given on November 26, Beethoven's 'King Stephen' Overture and Larghetto from the second Symphony, Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte concerto (with Miss Rima Young as soloist), and the first two movements of Schumann's Pianoforte quintet, were the chief features of the programme. The conductor of the orchestral pieces was Mr. W. S. King.

HANLEY.—The performance of 'The Messiah' given by the Glee and Madrigal Society on December 19 surpassed, in the opinion of many, all this choir's previous achievements in the interpretation of the work. It was notable for purity of voice-quality, fluency of vocalisation, and power of sustaining tone. Some legitimate individual effects in Mr. John James's reading of the score added attraction and interest. The solo parts were well sustained by Miss Eva Rich, Miss Florence Taylor, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Robert Burnett. Mr. Ernest Hammond was at the organ.

HOLSWORTHY.—Smart's 'The bride of Dunkerron' was effectively performed by the Holsworthy Philharmonic Society on December 12, under the direction of Mr. H. H. Bennett. Excellent solo-singing was provided by Mlle. Fiffine de la Côte, Mr. Orlando Joliffe, and Mr. John Prout. Mr. John Furze, junr., assisted at the organ and Mr. Cecil Cooper at the pianoforte.

HUNSTANTON.—The Choral Society opened their twenty-fifth season on December 17, with an excellent performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' under the direction of Mr. B. Roden Hilder. The choir sang with efficiency and refined expressiveness, and provided an appropriate choral background to the solo singing of Miss Beryl Freeman, Miss Florence Atkin, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Neville Barber. The remainder of the programme included contributions by the orchestra, the four solo singers, and the Rev. Canon Cary-Elwes (violinist).

HYTHE.—The twenty-seventh concert of the Choral Society took place on January 15, when Dr. A. T. Froggatt conducted attractive performances of a number of madrigals and part-songs, including Palestrina's 'In good truth, when I am fondly loving' and Max Bruch's 'Morning song of praise.' Mr. Norman MacDonnell sang, and two movements from Tchaikovsky's Trio in A minor, Op. 50, were played by Mr. Alfred T. Dixon (violin), Mr. W. Trowell (violinello), and Dr. Froggatt (pianoforte).

JOHANNESBURG.—The Choral and Orchestral Society gave an excellent miscellaneous concert on December 13, under the direction of Mr. F. W. Peters, at the Wanderers' Hall, in the presence of an audience of 3,000. The choir and orchestra were heard together in 'The heavens are telling,' from 'The Creation,' Elgar's 'Land of hope and glory,' with Miss Edith Cowley as soloist, Coleridge-Taylor's 'The Viking's song,' and Gould's 'The fisher-mother's song.' The orchestra also contributed separately. The other soloists were Miss Blodwen Hopkins and Mr. Charles Sparrow.

KESWICK.—A concert of exceptional interest was given on January 10, by Miss Helen Marshall's Ladies' Choir. Brahms's four Trios, Op. 17, were given with their full accompaniment for two horns (Messrs. F. and Otto Paersch) and harp (Mr. Charles Collier). The choir also gave Ernest Walker's 'The song of Proserpine,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Encinctured with a twine of leaves,' Vaughan Williams's 'Sound sleep,' Elgar's 'The snow,' and other part-songs. Action-songs were given by St. John's School Choir. Miss M. Ballantyne was at the pianoforte.

LANCASTER.—On December 11, Mr. Aldous's Choir gave a very successful concert in the Town Hall. They maintained their high reputation in part-songs with which they had won honours at recent musical Festivals. Bantock's six-part Nocturne, 'The nightingale is silent,' Mackenzie's eight-part song, 'My soul would drink those echoes,' Cornelius's six-part song, 'I can but love thee,' and Sibelius's 'Impromptu' for female voices were among the best features. Mr. Charles Tre sang, and Miss Sybil Keymer played violin solos. Mr. J. W. Aldous conducted.

LEAMINGTON.—'The Messiah' was given as an extra concert on January 2 by the Leamington Choral Society. The principal vocalists were Miss Nellie Judson, Miss Aimée Parkerson, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Joseph Ireland. Mr. H. Gibbon conducted.

MELBOURNE.—The annual Students' Concert of the University of Melbourne Conservatorium of Music took place at the Town Hall on December 10. Four pianists, three violinists, two organists, and five vocalists appeared—in most cases contributing concerto movements and operatic arias with orchestral accompaniment—and part-songs were given by Miss Harrington's class. Professor Franklin Peterson, director of the Conservatorium, conducted.

MILFORD-ON-SEA.—The 'Hymn of Praise' was performed by the Choral Society on January 8. The soloists were Mrs. Polson, Miss Margaret Wood, and Mr. Frank Major of Winchester Cathedral Choir. Owing to an important gathering at Lynton the audience was not as large as usual, but those that came expressed themselves as highly gratified with the performance. A competent orchestra, consisting of amateurs led by professionals, played the accompaniment and the Symphony. The conductor was Mr. Abdy Williams.

NORWICH.—'Conféro,' a fairy operetta in three acts written by Mr. H. Jostling Bryant (librettist) and Mr. Ernest Harcourt (composer), was produced with such success in October that four performances have been given in Norwich, and arrangements made for its repetition in Great Yarmouth on January 30, and Cromer on March 24 (Easter Monday). The principals and chorus number forty players, and the accompaniments are supplied by a small orchestra and pianoforte. The performances are given under the composer's direction.

PENRITH.—The third biennial Festival, which took place on November 20 and 21, was again an event of exceptional interest and importance to the locality. The presence of a professional orchestra of fifty-four performers, and of Sir Henry Wood as conductor, gave special significance to the opening concert, at which the piece de résistance was Elgar's 'King Olaf,' the choral body concerned being the Penrith Musical Society. The choir sang with every shade of expression, and revealed the executive ability they have attained at the hands of their regular conductor, Mr. Godfrey Brown, now retired. The same concert provided performances of popular orchestral numbers. The vocalists of the occasion were Miss Carrie Tubbs, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. John Prout. At the second concert the choir were conducted by Mr. Brown, who officiated in this capacity for the last time. The choral numbers were Bruch's 'Morning song of praise,' Bantock's 'On Himalay' and 'Awake, awake,' Morley's 'Fire, fire my heart,' and Barnby's 'Sweet and low.' A small orchestra, also under Mr. Brown's direction, contributed Grainger's 'Mock Morris' and other works, and solos were given by Miss Alys Bateman, Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Parlovitz (pianist), and Herr Johannes Wolff (violinist). At the close of the first half of the programme a presentation was made to Mr. and Mrs. Godfrey Brown.

PERTH (N.B.).—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was excellently performed by Mr. Richardson's Choral Society on December 18, and both the work and its presentation were received with marked approval. The choir of 120 and the orchestra of forty contrived to make the most of the abundant expressive possibilities of the music. The solo parts were ably sung by Miss Doris Carter, Miss Christian Keay, Mr. William Davidson, and Mr. A. C. Richard. The orchestra played German's 'Gipsy suite,' and the vocal soloists, with Miss Ruby Bramhill (harpist), helped to provide a miscellaneous programme. Mr. Richardson conducted.

SOUTHPORT.—In the Cambridge Hall on Friday, December 13, the Southport Choral Society gave for their first concert an excellent all-round performance of Coleridge-Taylor's complete 'Hiawatha,' preceded by the same composer's 'Eastern Dance,' from the 'Nero' Suite. The band and choir alike entered con amore into the spirit of the work, which was enthusiastically received by a large audience. The solos were in the capable hands of Miss Mary Leighton, Mr. Gwynne Davies, and Mr. Sidney Wilde. Mr. J. C. Clarke conducted.

WIGAN.—The Wigan and District Philharmonic Society recently gave an enjoyable concert, in which their singing of difficult unaccompanied part-songs and the excellent work of Miss Alys Bateman, Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Parlovitz (pianist), and Mr. Johannes Wolf (violinist) made up an excellent programme. Under Mr. Edgar C. Robinson's direction the choir gave expressive interpretations of Elgar's 'Weary wind of the west' and 'Go, song of mine,' Bantock's 'On Himalay,' and Tomkins's madrigal, 'The Fauns and Satyrs tripping.'

Foreign Notes.

ALTENBURG.

Siegfried Wagner's opera, 'Der Bärenhäuter,' was recently given for the first time at the Court Opera.

ANTWERP.

The event of the season has been the visit of Dr. Richard Strauss, who conducted a programme of his own compositions at the second of the Nouveaux Concerts on December 16. Among the works heard were the Prelude to 'Guntram,' the closing scene from 'Salome,' some songs with orchestra, and the tone-poems 'Till Eulenspiegel' and 'Don Quixote.'

BERLIN.

The two concerts given by Mr. Thomas Beecham and his orchestra were highly successful. The programme of the first concert included Frederick Delius's 'Brigg Fair' and 'Dance Rhapsody,' and Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris.' At the second concert Delius's 'Paris,' Granville Bantock's 'Fifine at the Fair,' and the symphonic-poem 'Ulalume,' by Joseph Holbrooke, were played. The Press accorded most generous—in many cases even enthusiastic—praise to the compositions, the conductor, and his excellent orchestra, 'in which,' says the Signale, 'every man, though still young, seems to be an artist.'—The famous Russian Ballet has made a number of successful appearances. Besides well-known works in their repertoire, two new ballets, 'Der Feuervogel' and 'Petruschka,' with very interesting music by Igor Stravinsky, were given.—Herr Weingartner concluded his concerts at Fürstenwalde with a performance of Beethoven's ninth Symphony. A public banquet was given in his honour in Berlin, when the élite of all classes of Berlin society were present. Next year ten concerts will be given at Fürstenwalde.—A 'Schauspielouverture' by Erich Wolfgang Korngold was played for the first time at the fifth Philharmonic Concert, under the conductorship of Professor Arthur Nikisch.—Under the direction of Herr Fritz Steinbach, Weingartner's new 'Lustige-Ouverture' was performed for the first time in Berlin at the second concert of the 'Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.' The programme also included Mozart's Serenade in B flat major for thirteen wind instruments.—At Herr Oskar Fried's third symphony concert, E. N. von Reznicek's symphonic-poem, 'Schlemihl,' a work of considerable complexity, was produced under the composer's direction, and proved interesting.—Hadley's orchestral rhapsody, 'The culprit Fay,' and a Suite by Alfredo Casella, were included in the programme of the third symphony concert given by Mr. Theodore Spiering.—Weber's 'Oberon' has been revived at the Charlottenburger Opernhaus.—An interesting recital, devoted to old Italian duets and airs, was given under the auspices of Dr. Landshoff, when the programme included works by Agostino Steffani, Benedetto Marcello, d'Astorga, Paësiello, Luigi Rossi, Erlebach, Stradella, Bononcini, and Handel. The Loewensohn Quartet produced an interesting new String quartet, 'Hebraïkon,' Op. 14, by Paul Ertel.—Maeterlinck's 'The blue bird,' with incidental music by Humperdinck, was produced at the Deutsches Theater on December 23.—Signor Ferruccio Busoni is giving four orchestral concerts devoted to modern works. At the first of these, on December 28, Max Reger conducted his 'Romantische suite,' Op. 125, and a song with orchestra, 'An die Hoffnung,' for the first time in Berlin. Signor Busoni himself conducted the 'Froschteichszene' from his opera, 'Die Brautwahl.'—A Symphonic Suite, arranged from the same opera, was played at Herr Oskar Fried's fourth symphony concert, when also Herr Fried's music to Verhaeren's poem, 'Die Auswanderer,' was produced.—A new music-drama, 'Wieland der Schmied,' by Kurt Hösle, was produced at the Deutsches Opernhaus. The composer, who has himself written the libretto, has partly used Richard Wagner's sketch of the same subject.—Two symphonic sketches by Leopold von der Pals, Woikowsky-Biedau's Melodram (for reciter and orchestra), 'Die Mette von Marienburg,' and Weingartner's Violin concerto, with Herr Gustav Havemann as soloist, were performed at a symphony concert conducted by Herr José Eibenschütz.—A concert devoted to modern French chamber-music was given under the auspices of the French musical periodical, S. I. M. The programme included Florent Schmitt's Pianoforte quintet, Debussy's String quartet, and interesting pianoforte pieces by Deodat de Séverac and Gabriel Fauré.—Professor Georg Schumann, Willy Hess, and Dechert have given performances of the late Wilhelm Berger's unpublished Pianoforte quartet and a Sonata for viola da gamba and pianoforte by Ph. Em. Bach (recently edited by Professor Schumann from a manuscript belonging to the Singakademie).

BONN.

An interesting orchestral Suite, 'Die Fee Ogliana,' by Iwan Knorr, was recently performed at a symphony concert of the Municipal Orchestra.

BOSTON.

Joseph Holbrooke's 'Queen Mab' was given under the conductorship of Dr. Karl Muck at a symphony concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 4 and 5, and was well received.

BREMEN.

Hans Pfitzner's Overture, 'Das Christelflein,' was played for the first time at the fifth Philharmonic concert.—The most interesting feature of the second chamber-music concert of the Philharmonic Society was the performance of L. Rudolph's String quartet in G minor, Op. 1.—An interesting programme of old works, both for flute, violin, and pianoforte, including a Trio by Locatelli and a Suite by Johann Ludwig Krebs, was given at a concert of the Gerdes-Testa Trio.

BRUSSELS.

At the Théâtre Royale de la Monnaie, Beethoven's 'Fidelio' was recently performed for the twenty-fifth time since its revival last season—a record that does credit to the taste of the Brussels public.—Pursuing their scheme of performing classical operas in their original form (inaugurated last year), Messrs. Kufferath and Guidé have now presented Mozart's 'Magic flute,' under the musical direction of Herr Otto Lohse. At the last concert of the Société J. S. Bach, the secular cantata 'Mer han en neue Oberkeet' was heard with great pleasure. On the same occasion Professor Julius Butts played the Pianoforte concerto in F minor, with string orchestra, excellently.

CHICAGO.

Many interesting works, including Balakirev's 'Overture on a Spanish march theme,' Symphonies in B minor and E flat major by Borodine, a Fantasy on Finnish folk-songs by Glazounoff, Dvorák's 'Dramatic Overture,' a symphonic fantasy, 'Villanelle du Diable,' Op. 9, by Charles Martin Löffler, a Symphony in G major by Ewald Straesser, Widor's 'Choral et variations' for harp and orchestra, and Smetana's symphonic-poems, 'Sarka,' 'Vysehrad,' and 'Vlatava' have been heard at the symphony concerts of the Thomas Orchestra (conductor, Mr. Frederick Stock).—On December 16, Massenet's opera 'Hérodiade' was given for the first time by the Chicago Opera Company.

COLOGNE.

Verdi's opera 'Othello' was recently revived at the Municipal Opera House.—Erich Wolfgang Korngold's Schauspielloverture, and Delius's symphonic-poem 'Lebenstanz' were included in the programme of the fifth Gürzenich Concert, conducted by Herr Fritz Steinbach.

COPENHAGEN.

Wolff-Ferrari's cantata 'La vita nuova' was given at the Musikforeningen's last concert under the conductorship of Professor Frank Neruda.

DESSAU.

Under the direction of Herr Franz Mikorey, Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was given for the first time at the Court Theatre.

DORTMUND.

Mahler's colossal eighth Symphony was given for the first time at a concert of the Musikverein (conductor, Professor Janssen).—Handel's Organ concerto in B flat, two Motets by Palestrina, and a Sanctus by Orlando di Lasso, were performed at a concert given by Musikdirektor Holtschneider.

DRESDEN.

At a recent concert given by Professor Georg Schumann and Herr Theo Bauer, the former's new second Violin sonata was successfully produced.—Under the direction of Herr von Schuch, d'Albert's latest opera 'Liebesketten' was given for the first time, with considerable success, at the Royal Opera.

DÜSSELDORF.

Among the compositions recently given at the concerts conducted by Professor Karl Panzner have been Ewald Straesser's Symphony in G minor, Op. 22, a 'Symphonia tragica,' by Draeseke, a new phantasy 'Das Leben ein Traum,' for violin and orchestra, by Dr. Otto Neitzel, and Reger's Romantische Suite.

ELBERFELD.

Heinrich Zöllner's opera 'Der Ueberfall' was lately given at the Municipal Theatre for the first time, and had a very favourable reception.

FRANKFURT.

A solo cantata by Bach, 'Mein Herz schwimmt in Blut' (the manuscript of which was recently discovered at Copenhagen), was performed by Frau Kaempfert for the first time in Germany, at the fourth concert of the Tonkünstlerorchester.

HALLE.

Scgambati's 'Requiem' has been performed by the Robert Franz-Singakademie. At another concert given by the same choir and devoted to smaller choral works, the programme included Humperdinck's 'Wallfahrt nach Kevelaar,' Max Bruch's 'Flucht nach Aegypten,' 'Wanderers Nachtlied' by Karl Klanert, and 'Elfenlied' and 'Christnacht' by Hugo Wolf, all of which were performed for the first time here.—Beethoven's rarely heard Triple Concerto for pianoforte, violin, violoncello, and orchestra was played at the third Winderstein concert.

HAMBURG.

Walter Braunsfels's overture 'Prinzessin Brambilla' and a Violin concerto by the Danish composer, Hakon Børresen (soloist, Herr Julius Thornberg), were included in the programme of the second concert of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra (conductor Professor Nikisch).—Delius's 'Dance Rhapsody' was played for the first time at the fifth Philharmonic Concert, conducted by Herr Siegmund von Hausegger.—Arnold Schönberg's Sextet for strings, 'Verklärte Nacht,' was performed at the second chamber-music concert of the Philharmonic Society.

KIEL.

Georg Schumann's 'Das Tränenkrüglein,' for solo voices, mixed choir, pianoforte, harmonium, and harp was produced under the composer's direction at a concert of the Kieler Gesangverein. Another feature of this concert was the performance of a number of old English madrigals.—Max Reger conducted his 'Symphonic prologue to a tragedy' at the second concert of the Verein der Musikfreunde, on which occasion he also took part with Herr Kunsemüller in a performance of his 'Variations for two pianofortes on a theme of Beethoven.'

KREFELD.

A new three-act opera 'Die Glocken von Plurs,' by Ernst H. Seyffardt, was recently produced at the Municipal Theatre. Shortly afterwards, H. W. von Waltershausen's opera, 'Oberst Chabert,' was given for the first time.

LEIPSIC.

Max Reger's 'Die Nonnen,' Brahms's 'German Requiem,' Bruckner's fourth Symphony, Volkmann's overture to Shakespeare's 'Richard III.,' and Scgambati's Symphony in D major have been performed at the Gewandhaus concerts.—Rimsky-Korsakoff's Pianoforte concerto in C sharp minor was played by Miss Eleanor Spencer at the sixth Philharmonic Concert (conductor, Professor Winderstein).

LYONS.

Sylvio Lazzari's opera, 'La Lépreuse,' was recently performed for the first time at the Grand Théâtre, and was favourably received.

MOSCOW.

The first concert of the Imperial Russian Musical Society was devoted to compositions by Glazounoff, the programme including, among other works, his new Pianoforte concerto (soloist, M. Orloff). Rachmaninoff's second Symphony, Scriabine's tone-poem, 'L'Extase,' and Glazounoff's Violin concerto (soloist, Miss Kathleen Parlow), were heard at the second concert.

NAPLES.

The opera season at the San Carlo Theatre opened on December 26. The repertoire includes Wagner's 'Das Rheingold,' Wolff-Ferrari's 'Il Segreto di Susanna,' Pizzetti's 'Fedra' (with libretto by Gabriele d'Annunzio), 'Gli Zingari,' by Leoncavallo, Puccini's 'La Fanciulla del West,' 'Iris,' and 'Isabeau,' by Mascagni, Catalani's 'Wally,' and Verdi's 'Otello.'

NEW YORK.

Mozart's 'Die Zauberflöte,' Puccini's 'Manon Lescaut,' and Wolff-Ferrari's 'Il Segreto di Susanna' have been given for the first time at the Metropolitan Opera House. Wagner's 'Parsifal' has been performed several times.

PARIS.

M. Camille Erlanger's opera 'La Sorcière' (to a libretto by M. André Sardou, adapted from the drama by Victorien Sardou) was successfully produced at the Opéra-Comique on December 16.—On December 22 M. Gabriel Pierné's oratorio 'Saint François d'Assise' was given at the Colonne Concert under the composer's direction.—Chausson's Symphony in B flat major and Vincent d'Indy's 'Wallenstein' Symphony have figured in the programmes of the Lamoureux Concerts.—M. Vincent d'Indy's opera 'Fervaal' was given for the first time at the Grand Opéra. It is reported that the work created a profound impression.

ST. PETERSBURG.

A Symphony by the Danish composer, Louis Glass, was performed under the direction of M. Safonoff at the first concert of the Imperial Russian Music Society.—M. Kusnezitsky gave four special concerts devoted to compositions by Tchaikovsky. At his second symphony concert Scriabine's tone-poem, 'L'Extase,' and compositions by Fanelli and Debussy, were heard. Mahler's 'Kinder-totenlieder' were sung by Madame Sbrujeva at the first Siloti Concert. On the same occasion Roger Ducasse's Scherzo 'Le joli-jeu de furet,' and Ravel's 'Valse nobles et sentimentales' were performed.

STETTIN.

Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was recently given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre, with considerable success.

STUTTGART.

Arnold Schönberg's 'Lieder des Pierrot lunaire,' and the String sextet 'Verklärte Nacht,' have lately been heard here. The latter work found numerous admirers.

VIENNA.

The prize of 10,000 Kronen offered by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde has been won by Karl Prohaska with a choral work, 'Frühlingsfeier.' The hundredth anniversary of the formation of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde was celebrated recently.—A very interesting and most original Rhapsodie for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Joseph Marx, was recently produced with great success.

ZÜRICH.

Under the direction of Dr. Lothar Kempster, Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was given at the Opera for the first time on December 5 with great success.

WEIMAR.

An unpublished Trauerode, 'La Notte,' by Liszt, was performed at the third concert at the Court Theatre, under the conductorship of Herr Peter Raabe.

Miscellaneous.

The following awards have been made at the Royal Academy of Music: the Battison Haynes prize (composition) to Eric Grant; the Hine Prize (composition) to Egerton Tidmarsh, Sydenham; the Westmorland Scholarship (singing) to Raymond I. Ellis, Minsk, Russia; the Potter Exhibition (pianoforte) to Florence Marr, Wimbledon; the Sainton-Dolby Prize (singing) to Elsie Gough, Manchester; the Russon Memorial Prizes to (tenor) F. Ernest Osborne, Sudbury, Middlesex, and (contralto) Phoebe Cooke, London; the R.A.M. Prize duet for two pianofortes to Harriet Cohen, London, and Vivian Langrish, Bristol.

At the conclusion of the Christmas term of the Royal College of Music the following awards were made: Council Exhibitions to Clara Simons, Annie Rees, and Richard Swan, singing; Olive Fellowes, organ; Margaret Littlewood, violin; Edith Colam, violoncello; the Edmund Grove Exhibition to Lillie D. Chipp; the annual amount (£13) bequeathed by the late Edwin S. Dove for pupils who have distinguished themselves, to Eugene Goossens and Joseph Tafts, jointly; the Lesley Alexander Gift to John K. Snowden, Dove Scholar; the Manns Memorial Prize to Percival R. Kirby; the Leo Stern Memorial Gift to a violoncellist, to Maurice Soester.

Among the noteworthy features of musical life in Lancashire, the fruitful and highly inspired activity of Mr. Arthur W. Speed, of Southport, as a choral trainer and conductor have achieved prominent distinction. He has applied himself with particular enthusiasm to the performance of Elgar's choral works. Since 1904, he has been responsible, either independently or in connection with the Triennial Festival, for three performances of 'The dream of Gerontius,' two of 'The Kingdom,' one of 'The Apostles,' two of 'King Olaf,' two of the 'Coronation Ode,' and one of the first Symphony.

The Northwestern University Bulletin, the weekly periodical issued by the University at Evanston, Illinois, gives a record of the work carried on by the school of music under the guidance of the Dean, Dr. Peter Christian Lutkin. This would seem to be notably efficient and eventful. The feature of chief interest is an cappella students' choir that has gained considerable repute under the direction of the Dean. Dr. Lutkin also conducts a choral Society that took part in a recent North Shore (Chicago) Festival. On this occasion Bantock's 'Omar Khayyám' was performed for the first time in the West.

Mr. George Dodds, organist and choirmaster of Elswick Road Wesleyan Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, has now succeeded Dr. Coward as president of the Free Church Musicians' Union. The new president intends visiting all the centres in the country during his year of office. Mr. Arthur Berridge is now the London secretary, and the headquarters of the Union are established at the Binney Institute, in connection with the King's Weigh House Church, Grosvenor Square. Mr. H. F. Nicholls, of Newport, still fulfils the duties of general-secretary.

The Leeds Symphony Orchestra has been engaged for the series of Leeds Saturday Orchestral concerts, under the conductorship of Mr. H. A. Fricker. The orchestra is composed of many of the most experienced and well-known of Yorkshire artists, and has appeared with distinct success at the concerts of the Leeds Philharmonic Society, and of several prominent choral Societies in the North. It is managed by a limited company, of which Mr. Edward Maude is secretary.

Colston's (Boys') School, Stapleton, Bristol, affords a striking example of the advance made in the outlook on music in schools of this type. At the annual Christmas concert, Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was performed. Since 1904 nine similar works have been given with orchestral accompaniment. The concerts have been provided by the boys aided only by the School staff and old boys. We congratulate Mr. W. S. Calway, the music-master, on the success of his labours.

The annual 'Spring' Festival of the London Sunday School Choir will be held on February 22, at the Royal Albert Hall, South Kensington. The choir and orchestra will consist of 1,200 adult performers. Miss Ruth Vincent and Mr. Robert Radford have been engaged as soloists. The next great Crystal Palace Festival will be held on Wednesday, June 18, when choirs totalling 9,000 voices will perform.

The School of Folk-Song and Dance opened at Stratford-on-Avon on December 28 was again held with great success under the directorship of Mr. Cecil Sharp. A large number of students and several distinguished visitors attended. The English Folk-Dance Society has organized a 'Spring' Session of classes (January 16 to March 21), particulars of which can be obtained from the secretary, 11, Hart Street, W.C.

Parts 1 and 2 of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Scenes from Iliawatha' were performed in a successful manner by the Willoughby Road Wesleyan Choir, Hornsey, on December 18. The soloists were Madame O'Connor, Mr. H. Stuchberg, and Mr. C. H. Cunningham. Mr. George Swidenbank accompanied, and Mr. Charles Rowley conducted.

'The Informal Music Society' has been inaugurated with a music-room at 8, Maida Vale, as its headquarters. Its main object is to secure freedom, in the performance of music, from the distracting influences and conventions that hinder its complete enjoyment in ordinary concert-life. The secretary is Mrs. T. B. Reynolds, 10, Tor Gardens, Campden Hill, W. (Western 501.)

A scheme has been proposed for the endowment of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, Upper Norwood. Mr. Guy M. Campbell, who has served on the staff of this institution for the last thirty-three years, has been appointed to succeed his father, Sir Francis Campbell, as principal.

In the notice in last month's issue of the concert given by the Stock Exchange Choral and Orchestral Society, we inadvertently omitted to state that the choral items were conducted by Mr. Munro Davison. Mr. Davison, who has conducted the choral branch of this Society during the last fifteen years with conspicuous enthusiasm and ability, has now retired from the post, to the regret of all concerned.

The Musical Standard has celebrated its jubilee by reducing its price from twopence to one penny. The size remains as before, and it is stated that the contents will be up to the customary level. The first number was issued on August 2, 1862.

A new operetta by Mr. G. H. Clutsam entitled 'Das Spitzen Hemd' ('The lace chemise') is to be produced at the Kurfürstentoper, Berlin, in February.

A lecture on Bach's Toccatas was given by Mr. Fuller Maitland before a meeting of the Musical Association at Broadwood's on January 21.

Answers to Correspondents.

M. S. S. asks: 'At what time after the author's death does copyright expire? Is it possible for that period to be extended by any means?'

The answer to the first question depends upon the date of publication. If a work is published after July 1, 1912, the copyright will last for fifty years after the author's death. Of that fifty years, the first twenty-five is a period of absolute copyright—and the second twenty-five years is a period during which any one may print the work (subject to Board of Trade regulations) on paying to the proprietor of the copyright a royalty equal to 10 per cent. of the published price of the work—i.e., of the price at which he chooses to publish it. If the work was published before July 1, 1912, and if the copyright continued up to that day, the copyright will still last for fifty years from the author's death, but the period is divided into thirty years and twenty years instead of two equal periods of twenty-five years. The answer to the second question is, No—except by special exercise of the Royal Prerogative.

A. B.—The average metronome rates for the studies and pieces in the Associated Board Higher Division Pianoforte Examination, 1913, may be taken as follows: List A—Loeschhorn ♩=80; Pauer ♩=138; Bach ♩=104; Duncan ♩=116; List B—Loeschhorn ♩=126; Heller ♩=120; Farjeon ♩=76; Burgmüller ♩=126; List C—Czerny ♩=152; Steibelt ♩=144; Beethoven ♩=69; Spindler ♩=72. The quick movements should be taken at a slower tempo than those given above if the technique is inadequate for it.

FINGERS.—Everything depends on the 'method' you prefer. The most up-to-date book is Tobias Matthay's 'The act of touch' (Longmans). If this is too heavy to digest begin with his 'First principles of pianoforte playing.' Other excellent works are, 'Technique and Expression' by Franklin Taylor (Novello), and 'The Leschetitzky method' (Curwen).

CLAPTON.—We have made inquiries, and regret to say that we are unable to trace the authorship of the words of the part-song, 'Home is home, however lowly' (Garrett), which appeared in the Musical Times, No. 658.

MELBA.—One of the most thorough and reliable is Hans von Wolzogen's 'Guide through the music of the "Ring,"'

FEW Teachers or Students of Music could fail to derive great benefit from the wonderful publication that is being published by the Caxton Publishing Company—"The Musical Educator." Its aim is to supply in compact and interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

PADEREWSKI,
on "The Best Way to Study the Piano."

MARK HAMBOURG,
on "The Piano and How to Play it."

CARUSO,
on "The Cultivation of the Voice."

CLARA BUTT,
on "How to Sing a Song."

MADAME MARCHESI,
on "The Teaching of Singing."

EDWIN H. LEMARE,
on "The Art of Organ Playing."

JOHN DUNN,
on "Playing the Violin," and

SIR F. H. COWEN, on "The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

Its Value to the Teacher.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

TWO OPINIONS.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE.

"'The Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent." Dr. CRÉSER, Mus.D. Oxon., F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

"Novello's Organ Album No. 3 is remarkably good value. For the modest sum of three and sixpence, you get twelve pieces of varying excellence. As a rule, such albums are a kind of musical dust-heap, in which the purchaser delves (not too successfully) for his moneysworth. You need have no anxiety in this case."—Musical Opinion, June, 1912.

COMPOSITIONS BY ALFRED R. GAUL.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. TWENTY-FOURTH THOUSAND.

1. PASSION SERVICE

(Only published in Vocal Score)

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are, respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Mr. Gaul's work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

Arranged for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums. Words 7s. 6d. per 100.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

2. THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"The Cantata is replete with charming music of that school which everyone can appreciate, and which found so distinguished a master in Mendelssohn. If composers would follow their work with choral subjects, it is only reasonable to expect that they will bestow a fair share of their attention upon the choruses. The old masters knew this, and there is no doubt that the fact has much to do with the long continued popularity of their works; and there is equally little doubt, we think, that the principal cause of the failure of so many works produced nowadays is the uninteresting nature of the choruses. Compare the choruses of the three most popular works ever produced—"The Messiah," "Creation," and "Elijah"—with a large number of modern works, and our meaning will be clear. If we mistake not, such thoughts as these passed through Mr. Gaul's mind when he set himself to compose those works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins'; and that the public endorse his views is proved by the enormous sale which these works have had."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to excuse every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."

—The Musical Times.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

3. THE PRINCE OF PEACE

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . . Worthy the study of Choral Societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment."—Pontypool Free Press.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

Price of each Work, paper covers, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each, 1s.; Words only of 2, 3, 5, 7, 10, 15, 20, 25, 30, 40, 50, 60, 70, 80, 90, 100.

The loan of instrumental parts may be had on application to the Composers, and full liberty is given to perform the Cantata, and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

THE MUSIC MAKERS

ODE

BY

ARTHUR O'SHAUGHNESSY

SET TO MUSIC

FOR CONTRALTO SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

EDWARD ELGAR

(Op. 69).

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Paper Boards, 3s.; Cloth, 4s.; Vocal Parts, 1s. each; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. 6d.

String Parts, 9s.; Wind Parts and Full Score (on hire).

THE TIMES.

It is a setting of the Ode by Arthur O'Shaughnessy beginning "We are the music makers, and we are the dreamers of dreams," which extols the artist spirit as the motive power of human action. The words are of a kind to appeal strongly to such a mind as Elgar's and to bring from him music which makes a very direct appeal to the sympathy of his audience. The personal interpretation of the words given by the frequent quotations from his own earlier works no doubt heightens this appeal at the moment, and serves to secure an immediate acceptance for the work.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The music is often of exquisite beauty, . . . the Ode represents Elgar in the highest development of his creative faculty.

MORNING POST.

To illustrate the story of those who have inspired the music the composer draws from his own works, his quotations from himself being made with considerable subtlety. As in the case of a play founded upon a novel, it is necessary to know the original to appreciate its application, but as Elgar's music is now well known there is no difficulty on the part of the hearers. . . . The use made of familiar themes is happy, but nowhere is it so successfully made as at that portion where the soloist enters to describe the ignorance of the singers as to the effect of their work. Here the theme of the Nimrod number from the Enigma Variations is used, and, as reinforced by the chorus, the effect is very striking. Though using recognisable matter, the composer employs it in the best manner, and he works this section up to a mighty climax.

DAILY NEWS.

The whole is full of characteristic Elgarian beauty and ample contrasts. It is more easily intelligible at a first hearing than any of his important recent works, and its instant popularity would seem to be assured.

DAILY EXPRESS.

There is not a great deal of music, melodically speaking, in the swing of the lines, and after writing one wholly beautiful theme—a theme that is constantly recurring, if never with quite the same alluring appeal as when it is first heard in the orchestra—the composer continues on his way with a wealth of harmonic colour and forceful rhetoric.

DAILY MAIL.

"The Music Makers," Sir Edward Elgar's new choral ode, touches none of the depths of the composer's really memorable achievements excepting by the way of direct quotation. Yet it deserves, and will win, popular favour and many performances because of its fluent grace and beautifully accomplished workmanship.

Sir Edward Elgar is nowadays in the completest possession of his style of technical accomplishments. He can compose those glowing Elgarian harmonies, that rich orchestral colouring, whether he has or has not a considerable motive behind, just as Bach wrote counterpoint.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The brief prelude is full of that mystic atmosphere which Elgar knows so well how to produce, and the hushed entry of the chorus in some simple phrases is also very exquisite in effect. Then I think the music flags just a little until we come to a passage where the chorus sings (in ancient mode) of Nineveh, and the orchestra has a fine theme of swinging rhythm, suggesting an irresistible onward force.

Some of the finest music in the work begins with the entry of a contralto solo. "They had no vision amazing," sung to phrases of much imagination. . . . A fine climax, picturing "the infinite morning," is fashioned out of the big theme of the first Symphony, and soon the contralto voice enters again with a long solo of great emotional power and beauty. The ending brings once more the hushed mystic atmosphere with which the work opened.

FIFINE AT THE FAIR

(A DEFENCE OF INCONSTANCY).

AN ORCHESTRAL DRAMA

WITH A PROLOGUE

(AFTER BROWNING).

COMPOSED BY

GRANVILLE BANTOCK.

MINIATURE SCORE.

Price Five Shillings. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

Orchestral Parts, MS.

THE TIMES.

It is indeed a remarkably brilliant piece of work of its kind, and is one which it is easy to appreciate. . . . We have first a delicate prologue for strings which directly pictures the sensations described in Browning's "Amphibian," then a delightfully humorous scene of the Fair, then music intended to contrast the characters of Fifine and Elvire. . . . He never seems at a loss for a moment, and if his drama is apt to call up recollections of modern Italian opera, all the devices serve him well, because they convey certain ideas in a direct way to his audience.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Superbly put together, and invented and scored by a truly masterly hand, Bantock has not given us for many days a work so likely to bring worshippers to the shrine of his great and here genial talent.

STANDARD.

Mr. Granville Bantock's musical counterpart to Browning's "Fifine at the Fair" is quite the best thing that he has given us. He is never at a loss for a happy phrase, never displeased for want of right shade of colour. His music is realistic—splendidly and convincingly so in the Fair scene—objective and subjective; picturesque, sensuous and strong. In the more introspective passages his instruments moralise with singular eloquence. The clash of emotion—there is no need to dwell upon the cause, since Browning is an open book to all—is handled with mastery effect. . . . It is delightful music, and good hearing from beginning to end.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Bantock's orchestral drama, "Fifine at the Fair," is a brilliant contribution to English orchestral literature, original and modern in its ideas and masterly in its orchestral treatment of these. The music is founded upon Browning's poem of the same name, and is divided into a prologue, drama, and epilogue (as in the poem). The first section has given Mr. Bantock an opportunity for his fine powers of musical characterization, and the themes illustrating the nature of the three protagonists (Fifine, the Man, and his wife, Elvire) are very expressive and cleverly handled. The drama opens with a clever tone-picture of the Fair, which is almost one of the best things in the work, this being followed by a "Fifine portrait" of much cleverness. The epilogue music perhaps attracts one more by its cleverness than its inspiration, but here, too, the composer has written some pages glowing with a fine emotion and of much dramatic power.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Granville Bantock's orchestral drama, "Fifine," is a very brilliant and spirited piece of work, and in many ways stronger than any other work of the same class by Bantock.

YORKSHIRE POST.

No living musician has a greater power of orchestral expression, and his poetic fancy is inexhaustible. Never has it been employed on a more charming subject or with better effect than in this case. He has produced a work which will compare with the symphonic-poems of Strauss, and will be regarded by most people as more uniformly musical. It is not going too far to style it a masterly work, and entirely successful. It gives us the composer's own impressions of the drama; it illustrates in absolutely musical terms. It glows with colour; it is brilliant, atmospheric, passionate, in turn; and it is also thoroughly spontaneous and unaffected.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

In his orchestral drama, "Fifine at the Fair," Professor Granville Bantock has far surpassed all his previous achievements in orchestral music, and attempts not without success the scope of Strauss.

OBSERVER.

Professor Granville Bantock's "Fifine at the Fair," which is inspired by Browning's poem, is, taken as a whole, perhaps the strongest and best-proportioned of all the composer's symphonic works, and the fullest of real feeling, while the themes are the most expressive he has given us. . . . The way in which they are used, so as to represent the interplay of forces between the three chief characters, and the genuine power and beauty of much of the orchestral writing, make the work exceedingly good to hear.

SUNDAY TIMES.

He has succeeded in giving us a very picturesque and coherent Symphonic Poem, which is better worth listening to than almost anything from his pen.

A MANUAL OF PLAINSONG

FOR DIVINE SERVICE

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES NOTED THE PSALTER NOTED

TO GREGORIAN TONES

TOGETHER WITH THE LITANY AND RESPONSES

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plainson, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendixes to the Psalter; and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plainson. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plainson during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

TECHNIQUE

AND

EXPRESSION

IN

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY

JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—X.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

MOZART'S OPERAS

A CRITICAL STUDY BY E. J. DENT.

With Photogravure Frontispiece, several Portraits and Views, and numerous Musical Examples. 12s. 6d. Net.

Each opera is dealt with in detail from the standpoints of the libretto, the music, and the stage presentation; the plots are summarized concisely; and although the book does not profess to be a biography of Mozart, the circumstances under which the operas were composed are narrated and his mental conditions analysed. Among more general matters discussed are: the general principles of musical appreciation, principles of musical drama, nationality in music, the relation of song to speech, of vocal to instrumental music, and the methods of musical delineation of character.

No. 55.

THE ROYAL NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD, ABERGAVENNY.—August 4 to 8, 1913.

In our issue for December, 1912, it was announced that Mr. Granville Bantock had resigned his position as adjudicator at this event on the ground that the music chosen as tests was not in his opinion important enough. The arguments on each side were given in our summary of the correspondence that took place. Since this episode Dr. H. Walford Davies has accepted the position vacated by Mr. Bantock, but he has succeeded in inducing the Eisteddfod committee to expand their programme. The music already selected for the chief classes with money prizes will remain, but a 'Supreme Merit Class' without a money prize is to be tried. The test will be Bach's motet for double choir, 'Der Geist hilft unser Schwachheit auf' (published by Novello & Co. under the title, 'The Spirit also helpeth us'). This work is in three sections, the first of which is marked Andante con moto, the second is an Allegro moderato, which is succeeded by an Alla breve movement, and there is a final Chorale. The work takes from ten to twelve minutes in performance. We presume it will be sung unaccompanied. On the whole this test will be found sufficiently exacting.

Will the Welsh choirs rise to this occasion? They will gain enormously in reputation amongst musicians if they make this 'Honours' class a success. We await the result with much interest.

We know that Welsh choirs look to prize-money not for profit but to pay the heavy expenses to which they are often put in travelling, but if they enter this new class they will not be any worse off than when they lose at the competitions where there are money prizes. The localities from which they come should do all they can to support the new departure. We suggest, with due respect to all concerned, that as the object of the Eisteddfod is the promotion of artistic culture, which includes the development of the musical faculties of the Welsh race, it would be a gracious act to undertake to pay as much as possible of the travelling expenses of all choirs that compete in this class, no matter how they rank in the competition.

DIFFICULT MUSIC AND METHODS OF MARKING.

In the 'Daily Telegraph' of January 11, Mr. R. H. Legge, the chief critic of that newspaper, contributed an article on the above topics. In dealing with the second topic he criticised the system of marking printed in our January number. On the 18th a reply appeared from Dr. McNaught. We give Mr. Legge's article, with some small omissions, and Dr. McNaught's letter in full.

MR. R. H. LEGGE.

At the time of the last Blackpool meeting I took it upon myself to enter an emphatic protest against the choice of some of the music that was given to the competitors. At least one of the test-pieces had precious little pure music in it that I could find, either in reading the score or in hearing it sung. It was simply a collection of hideous difficulties piled up in a manner better calculated to destroy any embryo musical instincts than to help to develop them. Moreover, at a private rehearsal of the piece in question the conductor of the choir was heard to remark to his forces words to the effect that, though they had worked day and night for many weeks at the conquering only of the notes (they had had no time to try to understand the poem), they had failed to 'get the notes into their voices.' The conductor then added that, even so, he was quite certain (his language was considerably stronger than this) that no other competing choir could accomplish more than his had accomplished.

CHORAL GYMNASTICS.

Now is this kind of thing of any value to anyone? It is gymnastics, not musical exercise. I know that I shall be told that the choirs themselves ask for great difficulties, and that therefore they have to be supplied. But the difficulties must be musical. And are there none in many of the noblest British music that exists, the old madrigals? The manner in which the winning choir sang at sight a madrigal by Stevens at Blackpool was a revelation of all that is beautiful in vocal interpretation to some who had not previously experienced this Festival. The difficulties of madrigal singing are purely musical, and I would go so far as to say that if the other difficulties referred to above are of any practical use, it is the negative use of aiding the judges to decide. If, then, the judges cannot differentiate when the rational difficulties of madrigal singing, or the like, are being overcome, then I would prefer not to change the music but to change the judges! I cannot make myself believe that any possible good can ever be produced by a system that places the conquering of difficulties first among the virtues of a successful choir.

Nor do I think the system of scoring that obtains, according to the Musical Times, in the majority of Competitive Festivals to be the best that could be evolved, if I understand the system rightly. For example, let me quote from the same issue of that paper. A list is given of what appears to be a revised form of the marking-sheet. Here are two specimens of the method of marking: 'Choral classes, accuracy, 10 marks; tone, balance, blend, and intonation, 30 marks; attack, pronunciation, enunciation, 10 marks; expression, pace, rhythm, interpretation, 30 marks; general effect, 20 marks; total, 100.' The other specimen is for pianoforte classes, and is this: 'Accuracy, 20; technique, fluency, touch, 30; expression, pace, rhythm, interpretation, 30; general effect, 20.' And so it goes on, in every case more marks being assigned to expression, pace, rhythm, and interpretation than to general effect. Now, in the name of common-sense, what, roughly speaking, is general effect if it is not the sum of expression, pace, rhythm, and interpretation, &c.? Thirty marks are given in the solo vocalists' section to tone, voice, quality and production, and intonation, while only twenty are given again for general effect. This, to take no exaggerated example, seems to place the latest 'find' among beginning sopranos with a heaven-sent voice above an artist of the George Henschel type, whose voice never was the outstanding feature of his art. To put the matter bluntly, a genuine artist of inferior vocal gift has to give way to a person who may not necessarily be an artist at all, but merely the possessor of a glorious voice; which I venture to think is absurd!

AN EXAMINER'S METHOD.

Readers of the paper on which these comments are made will note further that, though the promoters of this system of marking consider it the best because it holds the field, they are yet not entirely convinced, for they used the expression, 'It is, no doubt, open to criticism.' I have recently had a conversation with a very distinguished musician, who has frequently sat in judgment at various Competitive Festivals, and his system, which he assures me has always worked with perfect satisfaction, is entirely different from that which I have commented upon. My friend says 'I judge entirely on the general effect of the performance as a whole. I never write a single figure or number, but I give a detailed description of each performance, noting the merits and demerits in detail, and giving especial prominence to sense of style and interpretation rather than to technical points.' There, I venture to think, you have the essential difference between Beckmesser, on the one hand, and old Hans Sachs on the other! I have not the space to go thoroughly into the detailed system of this examiner, but surely enough has already been said to show that au fond his system is altogether superior to the other, since it aims at a higher power, the art-sense as opposed to the technical equipment.

We all know to what Olympian heights technique has reached nowadays; I doubt, however, if the musical art has advanced proportionately. A point, by the way, that this examiner lays particular stress upon, which seems to be entirely overlooked by the other system, is that of regarding as specially worthy of distinction the singing of vocal solos from memory; and a good point it is, too. I have a number of notes made by my friend during the actual performances he was judging; and, frankly, they seem to me ideal, since they include comments on every side of the performance with a very strong leaning towards the artistic. There is the whole matter. I regret that I cannot see any particular value in the Festivals if they are to become the medium of mere technical display. Another point I would like elucidated is this: Are the judges who use the system I deprecate quite certain that their system has inherent in it a sufficiency of the element of encouragement? To myself, with some experience of Festivals, the method in vogue is more soul-destroying than encouraging. My friend quotes a case in his own experience where, by the system of figure marking, so to speak, a certain singer would have obtained, he says, about five marks in a hundred, and would have gone home broken-hearted. Yet she had real talent and a sense, however small, of style; but she had been abominably badly trained, if training it would be called. 'I commended her for her non-technical gifts, and begged her to get down to the A B C of her work.' She went home delighted, and set to work on the lines I indicated, and is accomplishing good work.' I prefer Hans Sachs to Beckmesser; there, so far as I am concerned, I leave the matter for the moment.

Dr. McNaught's reply:

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.'

Sir,—The competition festival movement owes much to the constant support given to it by the Daily Telegraph. This fact lends exceptional importance to the article on some aspects of the movement that appeared in your issue last Saturday, January 11.

First, your critic condemns some of the choral music used as tests at Blackpool. I agree with nearly all that he says under this head, but in fairness to the able and enterprising Selection Committee (of which I am not a member), I should like to point out that there were sixty-five test-pieces used at the Festival, and that at most only three of these have been questioned. Further, the committee did not compose the music. They simply sought for the works of the most distinguished musicians, and, as it were, said to the best choirs in the country, 'Here is what these well-known composers expect you to sing,' and the choirs bravely, and almost pathetically, wrestled with the barbed-wire entanglements placed in their path:

'Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do or die.'

The fact is, choral music, like all other 'advanced' music, is experiencing the pangs of the birth of a new idiom. Whether the infant will survive may be doubtful. Meanwhile, Blackpool and other up-to-date Festivals are paying liberal maternity benefits.

MARKING SYSTEMS.

The other matter dealt with by your critic invites more difference of opinion. A system of assessing competitors by marks is quoted from the Musical Times without reference to the explanatory qualifying remarks 'with which it is introduced, and it is bluntly assumed that the employment of marks must necessarily be inadequate: 'If,' he says, 'I understand the system rightly.' This is a saving grace, because I feel bound to remark that the application, object, and utility of the plan criticised are seriously misunderstood.

TECHNIQUE AND INTERPRETATION.

Your critic asks whether the system he deprecates has 'inherent in it a sufficiency of the element of encouragement.' It might be enough to point out that inasmuch as over 6,000 competitors almost overwhelmed judges at Blackpool, and that a similar number came to Birmingham last spring, and as many are expected shortly at Morecambe, there are abundant proofs of encouragement. But it is even more to the point to claim that the wonderful developments made at the great competitive gatherings in recent years have been nourished in the school of criticism now challenged.

Then to suggest that 'a genuine artist of inferior vocal gifts has,' on this plan, 'to give way to the possessor of a glorious voice' is to show an absolute lack of experience of the working of this and other similar marking schemes. Fine voices without fine interpretation have absolutely no chance whatever at Blackpool. At the Festival under discussion (October, 1912) the young contralto who, after singing against six others picked from over 500 competitors, won the chief prize in solo singing, displayed little technique, and her voice was not strong or otherwise striking. Yet four judges unanimously awarded her the 'Rose Bowl' (the chief prize) because of her moving temperamental interpretation of one of Bantock's 'Sappho' songs. Your critic says: 'I regret I cannot see any particular value of these Festivals if they are to become the medium of mere technical display.' No more do I, nor, so far as I am aware, does anyone concerned. My experience assures me that the great progress made at these Festivals during recent years has been mainly on the line of subordinating technique to interpretation.

UTILITY OF MARKING.

The idea of marking schemes is to assist judges in their difficult task. It is born of the exigencies of judging at competitions, during which observation must be keen and the registration of impressions rapid and sure; and the record should be in a form that will serve to recall first impressions. Competitors who have worked assiduously for months want to know, not only their weak and strong points, but also how they stand in relation to other competitors. How is this to be done? Your critic praises the plan of an adjudicator who says that he judges entirely on the general effect of the performance as a whole. Yet this judge goes on to say that he gives 'detailed descriptions in each performance, noting the merits and demerits in detail, and that he gives special prominence to sense of style,' &c. There is nothing novel in this. It is precisely what we all do. The report book of the Blackpool event fills sixty closely printed pages of such criticism. Then this most righteous judge quotes to your critic a case, in which he makes the extraordinary statement that only five marks out of one hundred would have been given (presumably by Blackpool judges), and 'yet the girl had real talent and a sense of style, however small.' This statement shows ignorance of the rational application of a marking system. As though other judges could not discern sense of style! I have no hesitation in awarding this judge five marks for his low opinion of the ability of his confreres and ninety-five for his Pharisaism.

Marking systems properly employed provide a refined vocabulary. They are especially useful to judges who have not a ready command of adjectives, or, at all events, suitable ones. Everything depends upon the common sense of the judges who use them.—Yours faithfully,

W. G. McNAUGHT.

THE OLDEST ENGLISH MUSICAL COMPETITION?

Which is the oldest local English musical competition? Until recently we thought that Workington (Cumberland) was first in the field, but Middlesbrough claims priority. Below we print the announcement of an event held there in 1879. Mr. Thomas, the secretary on that occasion, in sending us the original prospectus, says:

'There were frequent meetings held here between 1865 and 1879, at which I took part as a member of a choir, but, unfortunately, I have nothing in print referring to this.'

It will be noted that the competition is not announced as an Eisteddfod. Do any of our readers know of an older event—that is, one prior to 1865?

CHESTER.—December 26.

The twenty-fourth Christmas Eisteddfod again provided an interesting contest in the male-voice class. The interest would doubtless have been heightened had more than three choirs put in an appearance out of the seven that entered. The order of the result was as follows:—1st, Warrington; 2nd, Hadley and District; 3rd, Leeswood. The adjudicator was Mr. Harry Evans.

WORKINGTON.—January 1 and 2.

The welcome expansion of this Festival made it necessary to occupy two halls and to engage two adjudicators, Mr. Harry Evans and Mr. C. H. Fogg. There were over 1,200 competitors.

The tests, entries, and results in the choral competitions were as follows:

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Test: 'Hymn before action' (Walford Davies).

- 1st. Workington Wesleyan (Mr. A. Wood).
- 2nd. Whitehaven (Mr. R. H. Woledge).
- Millom (Mr. H. G. Cooke).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'It was a lover and his lass' (G. W. Chadwick).
'Hark the merry birds' (Arthur G. Phear).

- 2nd. Millom Vocal Union (Mr. R. R. Johnson).
- Haveygg Madrigal (Mr. H. G. Cooke).
- Workington (Mr. A. Wood).
- 1st. Whitehaven (Mr. H. G. Woledge).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: 'Ballad of Semmerwater' (Bainton).
'Old King Cole' (Nicholson).

- 1st. Millom Vocal Union (Mr. R. R. Johnson).
- Haveygg Madrigal (Mr. H. G. Cooke).
- 2nd. Seaton Choral Society (Mr. T. Dixon).

In the junior choral classes the most successful choir was that of Lamplugh Parochial School. Prizes in the solo divisions were won by Miss May Robinson (soprano and mezzo-soprano), Miss M. L. Cross (contralto), Miss J. Coughlan (tenor), Mr. J. T. Lacklinson (baritone), and Mr. F. E. Dobie (bass). Miss C. Leadbetter (violin, open class), Miss Ethel Young (pianoforte, open class), Maggie Borrowdale (girls' vocal solo), Joseph Waugh (boys' vocal solo).

PITTSBURG (U.S.A.).

A great Eisteddfod on Welsh lines is to be held in this city in July. It is stated that the test in the chief choral class will be 'King Olaf' (Elgar), which means we presume that all the choruses must be prepared, and that some will be chosen on the day for performance at the competition. The first-prize is no less than 5,500 dollars (about £1,100). In the male-voice class the tests are 'Castilia' (D. Protheroe) and 'What care I how fair she be' (Blumenthal). There will be a massed performance of 'King Olaf.'

MORRISTON (SOUTH WALES).

The forty-third annual Eisteddfod, held on Christmas and Boxing Days, attracted a great number of competitors. In the second choral class the prize for the best performance of 'Praise His awful Name' (Spohr) was awarded to the Carmel (Morriston) Choir. In the chief choral class the test-pieces were 'Stone Him to death' (Mendelssohn) and 'How sweet the moonlight sleeps' (D. Emlyn Evans). Pen-y-Graig Choral Society won. The adjudicators were Dr. Caradog Roberts and Mr. W. J. Evans.

DATES OF COMPETITIONS AND NAMES OF SECRETARIES.

[This list is in addition to that given in our last issue, in which sixty-two Festivals were announced.]

BRISBANE.—March 23, 25. Mr. S^r T. Little, Box 671, G.P.O., Brisbane.

BELFAST.—April 11, 12. Miss Beck, Queen's University.

PERTHSHIRE.—May 2, 3, 4. Mr. Ed. Nicol, Paradise Place, Perth.

RIPLEY.—May 13 (Whit-Tuesday). Mr. S. James, 1c Chapel Street, Ripley.

DUBLIN (Feis Ceoil).—May 19 to 24. Miss Alice B. Griffith and Miss Margaret O'Brien, 37, Molesworth Street, Dublin.

BRISTOL.—May 19, 20, 21, 22 and 24. Mr. W. E. Fowler, 'Mascotte,' Tyndall's Park.

NOTTINGHAM.—October 18. Mr. F. Purdy, 1, Claremont Terrace, Francis Street, Nottingham.

The first competition organized by the Congleton Male-voice Choir was held in the Town Hall, Congleton, on December 9. It was very successful. Five choirs entered in the children's section, the test-pieces being 'Come o'er the woodland' (Ketelbey) and 'Sleigh song' (Gustav Ernest), both from the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW, the first prize falling to the Woodcock Wells Choir (Mr. F. Wilmer), and the second to Moorland Juvenile Choir (Mr. A. Bailey). The Talke Glee Singers (Mr. F. F. Bossons) gained the male-voice choir prize. There were also solo-singing competitions for each class of voice. Mr. Charles Jessop and Mr. A. S. Burrows adjudicated.

The annual Festival held in this busy town was again a conspicuous success. The programme stated that this was the thirty-second annual event held under the auspices of this committee. As noted elsewhere, this Festival can claim to be one of the oldest—if not actually the oldest—in England. The Town Hall, in which nearly all the classes were held, is a handsome one with a commodious arena. The syllabus included classes for pianoforte, violin, vocal solos, and choirs variously constituted. The interest of the public at the competitions—especially those held in the evening—was great. The following were the chief results :

Soprano, Miss Agnes Elliott; contralto, Mrs. Hough; tenor, Mr. S. T. Edwards; bass, Mr. Tom Morris.

There was some delightful solo-singing in the children's classes. Nellie Aird, South Bank, was first in the girls' class, and Jack Birkbeck (who displayed a singular power of expression) gained that for boys.

Action-songs were well in evidence, and a wonderfully well-prepared piece, performed by the St. Philomena Girls, under Miss Mabel Lockey, was awarded the first place. In the children's choir class the Crescent Road School Senior Choir (Mr. Moses Bell) again won the challenge shield.

The church choir singing was very good. Coudon Wesleyan (Mr. John Teesdale) gave an impressive performance of Goss's 'O Saviour of the World,' and won the first place.

We give the criticisms in full on the Male-Voice Class.

The choirs in each class combined to sing the test-pieces under the conductorship of Dr. McNaught, who, with Dr. Caradog Roberts, adjudicated.

Miss Dilys Jones much added to the interest of the proceedings by performing songs in a very charming manner. Mr. Arthur Wilson was the official accompanist; and under Mr. B. J. Bowen, the hon. secretary, the whole machine moved with perfect smoothness and good-will.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: (a) 'Need I say how much I love thee' (Robinson).
(b) 'Song of the spirits over the waters' (Schubert).

2nd Prize.—Middlesbrough Apollo Male-Voice Choir.

(a) ... 10	(b) ... 10	(a) A nicely blended tone and a sleek execution. Finished style. Balance very good. Attack excellent. Details all attended to. Clean and expressive—no exaggerations. Caught much of the idea of the piece. (b) A fair pace, inclined to be fast. Caught the solemn, grave mood. Piu andante too fast—especially in view of what is coming. Execution firm. Attack generally good—exhibited training. Page 7 a trifle obscure. Expansion at ff climax fair. Too fast—occasional roughness. Unsteady, page 10, the rhythm not under complete control. Agitated. Piu mosso had to be too fast to be related to previous passage. The ff , page 24, well intended, but rather strained. Some good points of expression on the whole.

Stockton and Thornaby Male-Voice Choir.

(a) ... 10	(b) ... 10	(a) Well phrased. Not much sonority. Clear execution. Did not attempt to expand. Smooth musical tone and an agreeable blend. Bass a rich quality. A refined performance and fairly expressive. The end was fair, but not soft enough. On the whole tasteful. (b) Too loud and too fast! Lost mystery and significance. Piu andante did not sound right as relation. Inner parts somewhat rough. Vowels not round and loose enough to secure resonance. Page 5, 'Sheer from the towering crag,' capital rhythmic treatment, and the execution clear. Un poco piu mosso not fast enough. Bass run well vocalised. Pace got right before long. Later the rhythm deficient in suavity. Page 22, very good rhythmic treatment. End movement the same as the opening, too fast. Not moody enough.

1st Prize.—Cleveland Harmonic Male-voice Choir.

(a) ... 10	(b) ... 10	(a) A fine tone. Well knit, and the vowels unified. Had agreeable sweetness of blend. Withal a certain tenderness in the delivery that held attention. The moods were so well reflected. Phrase treatment showed uncommon skill. Highly finished. (b) Rather too fast. Did not suggest solemnity. (This for the instrumental opening.) Certainly an impressive mood was apparent when the choir entered. Piu andante better a shade faster to relate properly. Magnificent cres. Musical at the top of the climax. Tenors rather hard, top page 4. Page 5 too slow for the rhythm. But it was soon urged on. ppp finely realised. Deeply impressive interpretation. The imposing bass runs were splendid—very dramatic. Their fine voices a great asset. Tenors later shone admirably. End section nearly right as pace. Much taste shown. Piu mosso,—great pace but well controlled.

Hartlepool Excelsior Male-Voice Choir.

(a) ... 10	(b) ... 10	(a) Subdued and blendful. Noticeable restraint in the treatment. No exaggeration; but scarcely coloured enough—always delicately musical. Well phrased and rhythmically much to praise. Rather monotonous as expression. Piece would bear more variety—and some more feeling for climax. Attack excellent. (b) Opening much too fast—nearly twice as fast as it should go. A rather jerky treatment of the frequent quavers. Andante not a proper tempo relation to the preceding movement. Some good points in the expression here. Later the beauty and grace of the rhythm missed—became mechanical, square. Tone became rough at the 'ragged boulder' bit. Bass run fair. The inner parts not clear. Later the execution was smooth, but without special distinction. The piu mosso was excellent. Last section, like the opening, was too fast.

(a) ... 7	(b) ... 7	(a) Long note (minim) at 'love.' Second bar—a great license! Rhythm not well treated. Lacked delicacy. Tendency to ponderousness. So many contiguous notes with strong accent of the same degree. Attack somewhat ragged. F flat missed on page 3. Tone fair—sometimes the blend was very good. The expression was not very successful, but there were some effective bits. (b) A fair pace. Not much mood. But still showed some appreciation, and the blend was sweet. Andante a fair pace. Showed judgment. The tonal attack fair, sometimes not true. The middle voices sometimes hard and rough—spoiled the blend. Shaky on pages 7 and 8—very cloudy. Un poco mosso rough—casual. The bass run not bad. The tenors got tired. Their production wrong—strained. Became laboured. Industrious. The piu mosso good—the best feature.

PLAYING AT SIGHT IS EASY — NOT DIFFICULT.

The generally accepted idea amongst pianists—whether professionals or amateurs—is that nothing but continual practice will give the ability to play at sight. As an actual fact, this is far from being the case, since, by means of the EHREMAIER System, the ability can be acquired after three months of practice for a short time daily. In this time any pianist can acquire the ability to play at sight all music that is not beyond his technical powers. Only a few have the natural gift of sight-playing, but all others have now the opportunity to become sight-players without the drudgery of practice which has hitherto been necessary.

MEMORY

"NATURE'S PERFECT PROCESS"—(Copyright)

evolved by G. H. Cox and invariably used by nature when concentration of Brain Power is required; exemplified in Musicians, Scientists, &c., through all ages.

ALL SUBJECTS. CANNOT FAIL. EASILY APPLIED AT ONCE.

A NATURAL GIFT.

EVERY musician can play from MEMORY and EVERY one can strengthen general Memory by this system.

It gives new essential ideas on TEACHING and PRACTISING.

DR. W. F. CHOLMELEY, F.R.C.S., Wolverhampton.—"It seems to me to get at the whole root of the matter and to prove conclusively the absurdity of the modern method of education. In your medical and scientific facts, I can find no flaw, and the deductions you draw from them appear to me to be absolutely sound."

MR. H. STANLEY, 10, Princes' Street, Hanover Square, London. Voice Specialist and Lecturer.—"I consider the instructions of great value to parents, teachers, professional men—in fact, to all who realise the importance of memory, will, and clear thinking as the basis of successful achievement. It opens up new and more definite ways of teaching and learning, which prove that many of our previous methods of teaching and learning music, singing, and general educational subjects have been antagonistic to Nature. In consequence of this antagonism, the acquisition of accomplishments and of mental attainments of many students and children have been greatly retarded, if not almost wasted. The amount of time to be saved thereby will be enormous."

BUSINESS MAN (Huddersfield.) (Name can be given).—"I have worked through two memory systems, but I am sure you have got nearer to the root of the trouble with poor memories than anything I have come across before. I am making constant use of your system every day with very satisfactory results. I feel strongly the necessity of having the very best help it is possible to obtain, and am using yours only."

CONGREGATIONAL MINISTER (Name can be given).—"Your method is simple, natural, and sure for the cultivation of memory, the education of others, and personal training. Add to this that it is interesting, develops observation and concentration, may be used with facility by the youngest, and we have a method that very nearly approaches perfection."

A "SCHOOLMASTER near Leicester."—"Your system COMPELS a thoroughness which I never dreamed of before—a REAL thoroughness which I have already begun to apply to the violin and the removal of a defect of speech of many years' standing, namely, the trilling of the letter R."

MUSICIANS, TEACHERS, STUDENTS, ENGINEERS, SPEAKERS, BUSINESS MEN, and all who need memory, should write, stating subject required for, GEO. H. COX (Music Master, Tettenhall College). Address: Farringford, Tettenhall Road, Wolverhampton.

PREFACE.

The attention which of late years has been given to the valuable exercise of adding extreme parts to an inner part has induced the Author to add a new Section, comprising 41 additional Exercises, to Part II. of this work.

In conformity with the plan adopted in the other Sections, these additional Exercises have been—as far as possible—selected and adapted from Standard Compositions.

The whole book has also been carefully revised and corrected, and it is hoped that in its new form it will prove increasingly useful.

Albert Visetti

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

MARCH 1, 1913.

ALBERT VISETTI.

No other branch of musical study arouses keener interest and excites more exasperating discussion than that of singing, using that word in the old comprehensive meaning it enjoyed before 'voice-production' and other differentiating terms were invented. It is remarkable that nearly every voice-producer condemns the method of every other voice-producer. This being so, it is refreshing to dwell upon the work and views of a teacher who, so far as we can ascertain, has no definite physical theory to worry over, but who all the same is probably the busiest teacher of solo-singing in the country.

Albert Visetti was born at Salona (not at Spalato, as stated in Grove's Dictionary and elsewhere) in Dalmatia, on May 13, 1846. His father was an Italian who owned considerable landed property in the district, and his mother was an English-woman. Salona in the days of Diocletian was an important city, and as Visetti père had a bent towards archæology he became interested in plans for excavating the buried buildings, and for a time camped with his family on the site of Diocletian's palace. So it happened that the 1846 arrival was born in the Emperor's bath-room. Young Visetti's childhood was a very happy one. His father was a believer in the open air life, and so the family often slept out under the open canopy of heaven. At the age of seven Albert was sent to school at a monastery by the sea near his father's castle. He recalls that two of his duties were drawing water from a well and playing a sort of organ in the chapel. He had never received any musical education at home, but he had decided aptitude in this direction. A donkey used to assist the drawing of the bucket from the well, and Albert devised a scheme by which the animal acted as blower for the organ. One Christmas morning the donkey started braying, and the congregation, which was composed of superstitious peasants who were unaware of the ingenious blowing arrangement, were alarmed at what they believed to be an evil omen. But the priest made the most of the situation by reminding the peasants of the circumstances of the Nativity of our Lord, and suggested that the donkey had possibly been moved to remember what the day was. Afterwards the people came to the monastery in hope of hearing a repetition of the miracle.

When the time came for Albert to choose a profession his father desired him to be trained as a surgeon, and the lad reluctantly went to the medical school at Padua University. But he was soon repelled by what were to him the horrors of the dissecting room, and he abandoned the school. His inclinations towards music were supported by his mother, and eventually his father consented to allow him to pursue a musical career. He soon gained two scholarships, and then entered the Milan Conservatoire. On his way from Venice to Milan he and his fellow-travellers were stopped and robbed by brigands. At the Conservatoire, Visetti studied under Mazzucato and Nava, and ultimately took his degree, his exercise being a cantata 'Il cantico di cantaba,' the libretto of which was written for him by Arrigo Boito, who was a fellow-student. It was also at the Conservatoire that he first became acquainted with Verdi. Soon after leaving the Conservatoire he was appointed conductor of a series of concerts at Nice; and he next went to Paris, where he assisted Auber as organist in the Emperor Napoleon's private chapel at the Tuileries. Dumas père was present one day when Visetti was playing in a salon, and he promised to write an operatic libretto founded on 'Les trois Mousquetaires' for Visetti to set. This promise was fulfilled, and the music was almost completed when the Communards, who—after the great war in 1870-71—had gained possession of Paris, burned down Visetti's house and the score of the opera perished. The distracted state of France at this period induced Visetti to leave that country, and on May 1, 1871, he came to London and has practically lived here ever since. He soon began to be known as a teacher of singing and as a conductor, and his English sympathies derived from his mother were a ready passport to the best circles. Although thus identified with English life, it was not until 1884 that he took out letters of naturalisation and became a citizen of this country. In 1880 the King of Italy made him a Cavaliere of the Order of the Corona d'Italia.

For many years Visetti has been a member of the staff of the Royal College of Music (he was also previously attached to the National Training School of Music from which the College grew), the Guildhall School, the Watford School, Trinity College (London), and other musical institutions.

Kirkby Lunn, Agnes Nicholls, and Phyllis Lett are amongst the most famous of his pupils. He was musical director to Adelina Patti for seven years, and during that period she studied repertory under his direction, and he composed for her the popular song 'La Diva,' which she frequently performed.

From 1878 to 1890 he conducted the Bath Philharmonic Society (it is impossible to say how much the peculiar circumstances of his birth influenced him in this direction), for which he wrote two cantatas, 'The desert' and 'The praise of Song.' In 1904 he visited Canada for the purpose of giving a number of lectures on various musical subjects; and whilst he was in that country his advice was much sought after by budding vocalists.

In an interview reported in the Montreal Daily Witness he says:

First of all, you need health. You cannot be a singer without health. Then you need a certain kind of throat. The Italian throat, the German throat, can stand more than the English throat. And if I were giving advice at all, I would say that each person should commence in his own country. You know the silly habit of sending a person to Germany or Italy in the first instance. Perfectly fatal. You may have the best masters for the piano and the most indifferent masters for the voice. And it is all wrong. You should begin with your own country, with your own tongue. You should have the best masters. And after you have acquired the language of the foreign country you wish to go to, after you know a little about its history and atmosphere—why, then, being sure of yourself, you might go to Italy or to Germany; but to go there first, before there was promise of success, before there was knowledge, that would be quite fatal.

Further, he says:

He would advise everyone who has thought of a musical career to go to London—to the Royal College of Music, or the Royal Academy of Music.

The reason is simple. If you go to France you get French music. If you go to Germany you get German music, and so on. Go to England, and you will get the music of every nation. You will get Russian music, every class and style of music. The reason is that London is the most cosmopolitan city in the world. It attracts by its enormous compulsion, everything of interest and value. You have, in the Royal College of Music, not merely piano playing, but a comprehensive training which gives you everything from the piano to the full orchestral concert. You live in a musical atmosphere all the time. You derive the benefit of the ideas of all the other nations.

Notwithstanding the onerous nature of his teaching engagements, Visetti has displayed great literary activity. So far back as 1878 he translated into Italian Hullah's 'History of modern music.' This was the first English book on music issued in the Italian language, and it is gratifying to know that it has been used largely in Italy as a text-book. He also translated into Italian Dr. Franz Hueffer's 'Musical studies,' and he has written a life of Verdi. Visetti's contributions to magazines and newspapers would fill a large volume. His translation of Sir Hubert Parry's essay on 'Ugliness in music' (the original of which was read at the International Congress, and published in our issue for August, 1911) has enjoyed a large sale in Italy. Even more notable translations—Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens' and his 'Ode to St. Cecilia'—have been made, and will shortly be issued in Italy. As there are numerous mixed-voice choral Societies in that country, it is probable that these representative works will have considerable vogue. Visetti is a regular correspondent to newspapers in New Zealand, Australia, Italy, and France.

In one of his articles, entitled 'Music, the great healer,' he supports very ardently the idea that music can assist the recovery of health. He says:

Does it not behove all of us who are so blest with the inestimable boon of health to reflect upon the advantages we might be able to give to our less happy fellow-creatures? Let us use whatever power is in our hands for the further research in the cause of music as a means of cure, in the hope that our medical profession will see their way to give some thought to the question: and who can say what the future may bring forth? Is it not possible that one day music shall be known as the great Healer, in addition to the many uses of a new and progressive art?

Visetti is a staunch believer in our native Art, and no one has more steadfastly and successfully advocated the claims of British musicians to recognition on the Continent. Through his efforts the orchestral works of Sullivan, Sterndale Bennett, Stanford, &c., have been performed for the first time in Italy at La Scala, Milan, under Faccio; at Rome, under Mancinelli; at Naples, under Martucci.

Recently he has interested himself in advocating a formal national recognition of Stainer's well-known Sevenfold Amen. He has issued the following plea:

On the occasion of the last rehearsal of the Coronation music at Westminster Abbey, the choir was especially requested by Sir Frederick Bridge to sing the beautiful Sevenfold Amen by Sir John Stainer with every care to ensure perfection of rendering. The result justified the means, for surely never before have the exquisite harmonies of the English master been given with such devotional effect. Since that time it has often occurred to me that this beautiful Amen would form a perfect conclusion to every English church service, and that henceforth the powers-that-be should sanction its use. In this way it should become known as the 'English Amen,' in a similar manner that the 'Dresden Amen' is sung at Dresden Cathedral. Furthermore, it would afford a graceful and permanent tribute to one who did a great deal for our English Cathedral music.

It may be hoped that this excellent suggestion will receive the attention it fully deserves. There can be no doubt that Stainer's beautiful Amen is one of the nation's musical assets worthy to be placed beside Byrd's gem of purest ray serene, 'Non nobis Domine.'

He holds some strong opinions as to the alleged 'crisis in the vocal world,' as evidenced by the admittedly overcrowded state of the musical profession. He agrees that there is undoubtedly a crowd of unemployed, but he considers that most of them are mainly unemployable because they are half-trained would-be professional singers with partially developed voices, ludicrous diction, and a minimum of technique, to say nothing of temperament and insight as to interpretation; all this being the pathetic result of insufficient or improper training. If the public were determined to be satisfied with nothing less than cultured singers, he believes that overcrowding would cease and real art would prevail.

Amongst his numerous interesting reminiscences there are some associated with Gounod. Visetti was with the composer when 'Faust' was performed at La Scala, Milan. He relates the following incident:

Gounod's attention to detail was remarkable. Not being pleased with the realism of the old men's chorus in Act 2, he asked what could be done. So the idea struck me of going to the different almshouses and collecting any vocal vieillards that happened at that moment to be stage-struck. I was successful in my quest, and was instrumental in putting on the stage fifteen or twenty débutants of between seventy and eighty. I have heard this chorus many times since, but have always missed the realistic truth of that occasion.

Students will be naturally interested to know what the 'Maestro,' as his pupils are accustomed to call him, has to say upon the technique of the singer's art. Here are some of his obiter dicta, culled from various sources. He speaks with scorn of

THE ITALIAN METHOD.

Look at the columns of the newspapers, and you will find scores of names, and wonderful methods advertised; and amongst them, 'Professors' who teach the old Italian method, for this is always safe to draw the unwary, but it means nothing.

The frequency of the lesson was a great factor in the success some famous Italian teachers in the past have had with their pupils. The old masters took but a few pupils, and devoted their whole teaching time to them. That was really the 'Italian method,' about which so much nonsense has been talked and written.

There is too much said about production and method. The voice is made for you; all you can do is to see that the way of Nature is followed.

The following is a 'scale' of the vowels he recommends for study:

A, 4 sounds, as in day, lad, arm, awe.	¹	²	³	⁴
E, 2 sounds, as in reed, red.	¹	²
I, 2 sounds, as in ride, rid.	¹	²
O, 2 sounds, as in lo, love.	¹	²
U, 2 sounds, as in you, would.	¹	²
The open sounds are ...	(1)	(3)	(4)	(2)
	I	A	A	O
The medium sounds ...	(1)	(2)	(2)	(1)
	A	A	E	O
These should be developed as 'open' as possible.
The closed sounds are ...	(1)	(2)	(1)	(2)
	E	I	O	U
Compound vowels, such as oi in 'foil,' pronounced
faw - il ;
(long) (short)
And ou , as in 'shroud,' pronounced shrah - ood .
(long) (short)

Notice, too, very carefully, that 'closed' sounds do not mean that the throat is to be closed. The word applies to the colour or timbre of the sound. This is a distinction that it is almost impossible to make clear on paper, but let the student sing ah, immediately followed by oo, and he will at once distinguish the darker—that is, more closed—characteristic of the latter.

Now, as to naming the vowel most suitable for the commencement of study, I am confronted with a serious difficulty. It is generally admitted that the sound ah, as 'in father, is the one best suited to the emission of a pure tone. We are told that the lower jaw drops easily, and the tongue lies flat in the mouth. It is the natural sound, the first sound that a baby guided by nature utters; and, yet, with all these advantages, in the majority of cases it is not suited to the English throat.

JUDICIOUS VOWEL SELECTION.

By practising only on the open vowel ah, it is not easy for English students to acquire perfect control of breath and the free play of tongue and lower jaw so necessary for complete development. With many beginners ah draws up the larynx and produces a throaty quality. With some voices that suffer from the latter defect, I have found soft practice on the vowel ee very efficacious; but great care must be taken not to squeeze the sound or render it too acute; it is a dangerous vowel if used wrongly. Let the shading approximate to the i in 'hid,' especially on the upper notes.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE SOFT PALATE.

The soft palate plays a most important part in speaking and in singing; indeed, without it there would be no voice as it is understood in the human being. The roof of the mouth consists of the hard palate in front and the soft palate at the back, and it is the innumerable positions that the latter is capable of assuming during the emission of sound from the larynx that is responsible for speech. An animal cannot speak, it has no soft palate, a hard one being all that nature has endowed it with.

I teach my pupils to say the vowel sounds, oo, ah, ee, &c., naturally—that is, without artificial constraint—and then get them to sing the same sounds with similar lip and tongue positions. Speaking of the latter, too much is talked about making it flat. It is not kept flat while speaking, and nature should be followed when using the voice for singing.

HANDEL AND BACH AS EDUCATIONISTS.

From a vocal and educational point of view, nothing can equal the old oratorios—particularly the works of Handel and Bach. As a study for purity of tone, flexibility and control of breath, they are of the utmost value. And no tricks are possible here; the slightest roughness or faulty vowel pronunciation—or any of the hundred and one pitfalls that the singer must avoid—are immediately laid bare. Remember you will be singing a work that most of your listeners have heard many times, and there are those odious comparisons to be thought of. But do not neglect the study of oratorio on this account, particularly Handel. It will well repay your time and serious attention, for, as someone once said, 'it is the very springtime of song—there is something so imperishably vernal about it.'

DRAMATIC SINGING AND TONE.

In all dramatic singing the brain must be the controlling power; emotional feeling plays a large part in dramatic song, but anything approaching the hysterical must be avoided. As a rule the English singer errs on the side of not 'letting himself go' sufficiently; but my point is that feeling in song, when it is not governed mentally, is apt to lose its effect. And when singing words that require forcible utterance, do not lose quality. Very often I have heard singers with quite good voices give vent to ugly, harsh sounds under the impression that they were being dramatic. Occasionally—very occasionally—an 'ugly' word may require an 'ugly' tone in song, but any departure from a round musical tone is unwarranted.

THE CHOICE OF A SONG.

Here I must impress upon students, when the time comes for them to essay songs, to choose examples of an easy compass, and with a flowing, simple melody. Some of the work of the ultra-modern school, with its constant modulations and unexpected intervals, is not for them. The first songs must be treated as exercises, in which the principles of tone-formation are applied to words. And here I am going to repeat what I said in a former article. Do not tire the voice by singing over a new song. Finger it out at the pianoforte and learn it in that way. And when the melody and the time and the rhythm have been mastered, then it can be sung without damage to the voice. Even the simplest ballad needs preliminary study. There are many points to be observed, breathing places, the division of phrases, and so on. Try to mentally read the melody of every song before going to the pianoforte,—it is excellent practice for your sight-singing, and you will be surprised at the improvement that will show itself after a few months.

An almost invariable fault of amateurs, and a good many professionals as well, is the habit of 'dragging' a song, due to an excess of sentiment and to the prolongation of unimportant words. Always remember that, although every singer may be allowed a certain amount of licence in the rendering of a song—still he is, after all, but the interpreter of the composer, who, it is to be assumed, knows his own mind, and therefore entirely to alter the time of a composition is quite unwarrantable.

THE COLOUR OF THE VOICE.

Avoid an excess of climaxes. If these are frequently piled up one on the top of the other they lose all their significance. How often have I heard a song entirely ruined for the reason that when the singer came to the closing bars, where a dramatic effect was needed, he had completely exhausted all the emotional means at his command, and the final phrases were entirely robbed of their intended effect. Frequent violent crescendos become wearisome, and are totally unnecessary.

ARTISTIC RENDERING.

Guard against 'cheap' effects. One of the worst of these is the habit of slurring intervals. To the uncultured mind this implies a tender sentiment, but to those that understand it is an inartistic device worthy of the street singer. An occasional—a very occasional—slur may be allowed, but I have heard singers who could not sing two notes without it, and then it becomes, like the persistent tremolo, a positive vice. So choose a good ballad, not necessarily difficult because good, thoroughly study its points, then read the words over aloud, giving due emphasis to those that are important, and forgetting everything but an artistic rendering. 'Production' must not be ever-present in the mind during a song—let your individuality have free play. As I have said, seek for the poet's meaning, and having found it, give your version of it, not necessarily that of the professional singer you heard the day before; you may have discovered something that he missed.

In a paper read before the Musical Association on May 12, 1896, he discusses 'Tendencies of the operatic stage' as they appeared to be drifting at that period. His general conclusion is stated as follows:

Realism is an exaggeration of truth as sentimentality is an exaggeration of sentiment. Realism, if indiscriminately used, is deleterious to any form of art; and, more than to literature and painting, to music, whose essence is the ideal; but, however, realism is a safe starting-point toward the ideal. Man admires and receives his inspiration from heaven, but his feet stand on the solid ground. For so long as composers study human nature they are sure to be true to themselves and to their fellow-creatures; to find the ideal of the real world is—as it has been the case with the 'Nibelungen'—the work of a genius; and we shall now gauge the amount of genius of an operatic composer, no more by the degree of freshness and prettiness of his melodies, no more by the charm of his orchestration or by the cleverness of his counterpoint, but by the degree of truth he can give us freed from what is merely of the earth earthy.

Thus the end of the 19th century sees the realisation of Wagner's musical drama, and, in all appearance, the trilogy, 'Meistersinger,' 'Tristan' and 'Parsifal,' will remain for this century the nearest approach to a rational balance of the sister arts co-operating in the expression of a dramatic action. But after the 19th century, which will be over in four years, there will be a 20th century, and there will be a generation which will have all the advantages of the light and truth bequeathed to them by a hundred years of unequalled work. Will the generations of the 20th century accept the balance of the arts in the musical drama as determined by Wagner? It is very doubtful. Preposterous as it may seem, yet everything points to the possibility that the definite form of expression of a dramatic action which shall answer the feeling of a fresh and unbiassed generation will come out from the form of the modern English popular drama, where, however roughly, the words represent the material part and the music the emotional part of the action.

This aptly-expressed and reasoned opinion will be read with interest to-day, when we are still discussing the why and wherefore and future of opera.

THE HARMONIES OF SCRIABINE.

By G. H. CLUTSAM.

Musical development, during the last decade or so, has been primarily concerned with the elaboration of the resources of harmony. The balance of all the old theoretic essentials has been relentlessly upset, and with it most of the formal consideration that emphasized their functions. Whether the results be considered evolutionary or revolutionary, it is not to be denied—and there is something significant in the fact—that, in either event, many of the innovations have actually taken substantial root, become part and parcel of the modern composer's equipment, and in certain elementary aspects, already achieved the commonplace. The restless striving for the new has been forced by the limitations of expression involved by an adherence to the old diatonic and chromatic systems. They served their purpose for a long period, their contents produced many masterpieces, but their entire comprehension and the sounding of their positive and explicit shallows soon proved a hindrance to any sort of natural progress. Speech had exhausted itself all too early for the youngest of all arts to be considered as having approached maturity. The normal scales, and their obvious harmonies, were impotent in the service of the composer who sought to utter fresh things. Simplicity may be a motherly virtue, but it is only the commercially spirited, the feebly qualified, or the artificially resourceful artist, that dare take refuge beneath its generous wings. The escape from the simple is the finest incentive, as far as music is concerned, to fine art. Of course we can wallow in the complex that has no logical and definite justification. You can even get people to believe in your future if you are clever enough, and they don't understand you. Take the strange case of the composer Arnold Schönberg. His dreary meanderings with impossible combinations of notes, debilitated, palsied, and defenceless, have certainly gained him followers resulting in the establishment of an artistic brotherhood (whose tenets for some reason or other—but entirely illogically—have become associated with the art-theories of the post-impressionistic school of painting); but they possess no possibility of providing material for the composer or the audience of the future. They express nothing, they are not even paradoxical. What can you do with a man who does not hesitate to employ the entire chromatic scale in one chord combination, and probably regrets that a few more notes are not at his disposal? With Debussy, however, a scale satisfactory in every particular was formulated that has been of great value to every creator. Not for itself alone, but for its sympathy with—and extension of—those combinations of sounds that have served the music of the past in such excellent stead. In the 'Prometheus' of Scriabine we have arrived at a similar development to that of Debussy. His combination can be justified to the hilt, although its application at present appears to be somewhat elementary. Perhaps necessarily, as it was in the case of Debussy. It would be pretence to delve into Scriabine's work for its æsthetic import. As an expression of theosophical ecstasy, as a revelation of mysticism the music can only appeal to a congenial and not necessarily musical temperament. An examination of its technical details with their possibilities of absorption into the vast amount of expressive material already to the composer's hand, however, might be instructively considered. Scriabine works on a natural principle that met with a decided compromise at the hands of Debussy. Taking the series of notes that are produced from a fundamental tone by vibratory impulse:

THE F is always very flat, theoretically.

he evolves a chord-combination (omitting the fifth):

which he prefers to call a consonance, overlooking or ignoring the fact that we already have a great part of his series as a dominant and that his extra constituents, which, theoretically, suffer from out-of-tuneness, but which also for all practical purposes must perforce take refuge in our tempered scale, have all the elements and essentials leading naturally to a dominant chord. That is, as from dominant once removed, the capacity for anticipating a resolution. Debussy makes no claim of consonance for his chord, which also, as I have shown in an article on the Tonal Scale in the Musical Times some little time ago, is nothing but a direct dominant ninth with sharpened or flattened fifth or both in its completeness.

Scriabine, like Debussy, only in a stronger and more virile fashion, also takes his melodic or thematic material from his scale. The essential differences of the two scale innovations are of the slightest:

Ex. 3.

but the skip of the minor third in the Russian's makes a vast difference in the general effect. Inversion, close or extended, gives no variation by distribution to the Debussy scale. Its colour, as a sensation to the ear, is never disturbed. The colour of that of Scriabine is kaleidoscopic, its mutability by transposition almost justifying the composer calling in a light scheme to expressive aid.*

The few examples given in the programme book of the Queen's Hall Orchestra Symphony Concert on February 1, when 'Prometheus' was first introduced to the London public, provide almost all that is necessary in the way of a statement of Scriabine's methods. The easiest and perhaps most logical way to appreciate this scale (Ex. 3) is to commence it after the fundamentals have been discarded; i.e., the last six notes of Ex. 1, although the point, for practical purposes, is immaterial.

* To those who may be interested, a tabulation of the colour-scheme with which Scriabine illuminates his score is appended. It is presented in the customary circle of fifths:

C Red.	F# Bright blue
G Rosy-orange.	D# Violet.
D Yellow.	A# Purple.
A Green.	E# Steely, with the
E Pearly blue and the	B# glint of metal!
B shimmer of moonshine.	F Dark-red.

These colours arrange themselves nearly in spectrum-order. The tones E# and B# are, of course, out of the scheme, in their uncertain colour; but the import of the indication might easily be understood by those capable of appreciating the balance of the problem. His instrument for producing these colours, like Professor Rimington's colour-organ, has a keyboard. The striking of the note C, for instance, throws a red on a distant white screen. Double notes and chords produce various mixtures of light. The medium is, of course, electricity.

Requiring a sensitive handling interpretatively, the full realisation of the work's purport, on account of the many technical difficulties, cannot be said to have been achieved at this performance.

After a beginning on the chord in Example 2 in the depths of the orchestra, the main theme of the work is given to the horns:

Ex. 4.

This is derived from the following transposition of the scale:

Ex. 5.

The final bar, for consistency sake, can be considered to emanate from a portion of another transposition:

Ex. 6.

and it is wonderful how consistent on these lines the progress and Stimmung of the work are maintained. Take the trumpet call, for instance, that soon follows:

Ex. 7. 3 Trpts.

In the first bar the two scales (a) and (b) are distinctly suggested, the low G as a pedal note being lightly reiterated in the third upper chord. The second bar is obviously from (c), and the C (B#) common to both bars controls the progression most convincingly. On Ex. 8 (c) is also based the delightful and fluent melodic passage:

Ex. 8.

Ex. 9.

It will be also noticed that any of the constituents of this scale can readily be used as a fundamental and suggest a definite key. Ex. 9, for instance, despite the $B\sharp$ is as undoubtedly in B major as the following is in E major, despite the $E\sharp$ with its pedal of tonic and dominant. The scale is of course in this instance

Throughout the work the wonderful scope and vitality given to the resultant chord of the scale by the unusual tone and a-half interval cannot fail to be recognized. The ear speedily becomes accustomed to the derived combinations. The only question remaining is its satisfactory assimilation into our ordinary practical material. As used by Scriabine, we are provided with a vivid splash of colour, but it is in every respect unrestful. The ear is not yet to be denied in the progress of a work its points of punctuation. The full stop in 'Prometheus' comes once only at the end of the work. Keys are certainly touched upon, especially when the dominant major ninths and thirteenths exercise their prerogative, but they are never resolved.

As it appears to me, we are presented—as we were in the case of Debussy—with another beautiful chord that has all the privileges of a dominant in its preparation for a dominant. Take the complete chord in Ex. 2: the $F\sharp$ and A can move naturally to G, without alteration of the other parts, forming a dominant ninth. It can also be easily associated with scales generally in use. For instance, a common form of the ascending (and less common descending) minor scale contains all its constituents:

The chord can be associated with this familiar combination:

becoming, in its completeness:

Associated with the tonal scale:

such harmonic pleasantries as the following may be evolved:

As a matter of fact, the combination is as beautifully satisfactory as it is logical. When Scriabine's complete chord is sufficiently familiar to the ear as an entity—that is, a quasi-consonance—its logical development by suspension, augmentation, or anticipatory appoggiatura, opens up an extensive and brilliant field for further experiment. Exigencies of space prevent me going further into this matter, but the lines of treatment indicated should provide budding composers with some strange adventures into the unfamiliar.

THE PERPLEXITIES OF THE MODERN MUSIC-LOVER.

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

It is no uncommon occurrence for music-lovers or students of music, when engaging for the first time in a conversation about their favourite art (and especially about modern music), to discover that their knowledge does not extend in the same directions; that, for instance, a number of works—or even of composers—familiar to the one are to the other terra incognita. It is possible to detect even in the works of learned professionals assertions or omissions proving that certain facts or certain doings have escaped their vigilance. This in itself is not a thing to marvel at, as no human being can aspire to omniscience. But the reasons of our many shortcomings in the matter of musical information are instructive enough to deserve notice. As far as I know, they have not yet been enumerated. A few remarks on the subject will help to measure the really formidable difficulties inherent to the task that the earnest music-lover of to-day has to face—difficulties that to his predecessors were unknown.

Comparatively little trouble accrues for him from the enormous and continuous increase in the number of musical works, although of the myriads of works produced a small proportion only is worthy of notice, and although the labour of discovering this small proportion is almost Herculean. However, without overlooking the difficulty of the necessary selection, let us for the sake of argument take it for granted that our ideal music-lover has succeeded in eliminating, from all the music thrust upon him, the nine-and-a-half tenths upon which he would but waste his time and trouble: what will still be a cause of disheartening perplexity for him is the endless multiformity of the works that he will not have dispensed with.

The list of those works will include, on one hand, the small yet by no means inconsiderable percentage of modern music retained, and on the other hand, the classical works, which, having withstood the test of time, may be said to represent the best only of the older output.

But even in the matter of the classical répertoire, it will be found that his aspirations greatly exceed those of the quondam devotees of music. The progress of culture has resulted in considerable enlargements to the list of ancient works that deserve notice and appeal to our taste. To quote only a few instances at random, we have learned that Monteverdi was a very great musician, and that not to be acquainted with his madrigals, his 'Orfeo,' or his 'Incoronazione di Poppea,' is to miss a great deal; that composers like Palestrina, Vittoria, Orlando di Lasso, Peri, Caccini, Frescobaldi, Schütz, Kuhnau, the Couperins, Marc - Antoine Charpentier, Byrd, Gibbons, Purcell, Rust, and many others have as good a claim upon the concert-goer's attention as upon the historian's. We know that Bach is not to be remembered merely as the author of a few fugues, two Passions, and one Mass; and that after Johann Sebastian we must take into account Karl Philipp Emmanuel and other Bachs; that beside Gluck, we must give room to Rameau, and that Lulli deserves not to be under-rated; that the symphonies of the Mannheim school are often worth listening to, and so forth. The music-lover of yore had to cover a far lesser ground; and whereas our wider and deeper knowledge has awakened in us a thirst to know more, there are sufficient reasons for us to believe that as a rule he was perfectly content with what he found within his reach.

To become a connoisseur was, a few decades ago, quite easy: little was required beyond the cognizance of a few historical facts and platitudes; or, at the utmost, a degree of familiarity with the small number of recognised types or forms,—suite, sonata and symphony, cantata, oratorio, operabuffa, opera-seria, &c. The belief in dogmatic æsthetics and in the unchallenged authority of a few augurs left little room for uneasiness, and almost as little for independent investigation. Nowadays, the old doctrines are shattered, and replaced by better, if more disquieting, notions. Critical standards are establishing themselves. The music-lover of to-day no longer presented with certitudes in compressed form, or finding it no longer possible to believe in the infallibility of art-theories nor of art-judges, is compelled, if not to think for himself, at least to make his own selection among the proffered tenets and opinions. He has been taught, among many other things, that it is not wise to dismiss the output of a Liszt with a mere shrug of the shoulders, and that music has progressed even after Wagner or Brahms. And we may even venture to say that he has learned, or is learning, not to content himself, when puzzled by a modern work, with deploring the decay of art, and believing the artist to be a quack or a driveller.

Let us, then, imagine this well-grounded, open-minded music-lover reasonably conversant with the classical works, and resolved to become equally conversant with the modern music that he has succeeded in selecting as a worthy object of study, and try to appraise the task that lies before him.

The diversity of forms alone will prove a tolerably serious obstacle. The strict formal scheme of the classical sonata, quartet, or symphony, easy to master for the moderately-competent hearer or reader, has given place to what are called irregular forms, to the 'cyclic' form of César Franck and his school, to the free forms of the tone-poem, to the composite forms of Mahler's symphonies. From the technical point of view, there is hardly any common measure between a symphony by Mahler, one by Borodin, one by M. Vincent d'Indy, a tone-poem by Richard Struss, the 'Nocturnes' or 'La Mer' of M. Debussy.

If from instrumental music we pass to dramatic music, we notice as great a diversity. Let us take for instance 'Parsifal,' Moussorgsky's 'Boris Godounov,' Richard Strauss's 'Salome' or 'Elektra,' M. Debussy's 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' M. Albéric Magnard's 'Bérénice,'* it will be impossible to find anything common, not only between any of these works and the opera of 1850, but between any two of them.

If after having thus summarily alluded to striking and undeniable divergences (of which many kinds are to be found) we turn to their causes, we shall have no trouble in seeing that these causes are many, and for the greater part evident. But to grasp them is of no great practical help in respect of our present concern. Suppose for instance our student to understand that the influence of the properties of material (most suitably adduced in Sir H. Parry's excellent book on 'Style in Musical Art') suffices to account for the fact that between modern orchestral music and modern pianoforte music we observe great and numerous differences in style, whereas there has been a time when even vocal music and instrumental music were written in similar wise: will that afford him great help when, having studied the pianoforte output of some modern composer and turning to the same composer's orchestral output, he finds himself compelled to cover a great deal of new ground? No; it will merely remind him that he is to judge with open mind—and we assume that he should never forget this principle.

So manifold are the directions taken nowadays by musical art, that even the situation of the professional critic—granting him to possess greater experience and more sources of information, and making full allowance for both advantages—is hardly less perplexing than that of the mere concert-goer. Indeed, the more one knows of what is going on, the more one is tempted to consider the task of investigation as hopeless—and, I must add, the more one is tempted to undertake it and stick to it.

One of the best ways of beginning, and one that will help to avoid going astray, is to map out a rough survey of the existing musical schools—which will again show how more complicated matters are than they were about three-score years ago. Then the contemporary schools of music could be told on the fingers of one hand: now almost every European country has given birth to one more or less distinct school. Many have given birth to several; and some, like France, to three or four, widely different, and almost conflicting. When Schumann wrote, 'it seems as if the nations surrounding Germany were trying to shake off the yoke of German music; Chopin represents his race, Sterndale Bennett England: in Holland Verhulst gives hopes; in Hungary national tendencies are asserting themselves; mention is made of Glinka in Russia, of Hanssens in Belgium; Berlioz stands for France,' he showed most prophetic discernment. And with a few alterations, this sentence of his would actually sum up to-day's situation.

In speaking of modern musical schools as connected with nationalities, my intention is for the present neither to gainsay Mr. Ernest Newman's theory that there is no such thing as nationality in music* nor to acquiesce to it. One may or may not feel inclined to admit that considered from the ethnological or geographical point of view, the surroundings in which composers live exercise no lesser influence than considered from the historical; or in other words, that culture and ideals may differ as widely from country to country as from one century to another, and that corresponding differences may exist between works of art of two countries and between works of art of two centuries. But whilst acknowledging that modern music falls into a number of distinct categories in consequence of differences in purpose or in spirit, in scope, in style, &c., one may for the time being let the question stand, how far these differences result from race idiosyncrasies, or coincide with race differences.

It is impossible, however, to overlook a fact that seems to support Mr. Newman's views. Between composers of certain countries one notices differences as striking as those that upholders of the opposed theory would expect to result only from great differences of race or of epoch.

Taking the very characteristic instances afforded by modern France, let us suppose our music-lover to have studied the works of precursors, beginning with Berlioz, and to have reached those of Chabrier, of César Franck, of M. Saint-Saëns. He will have to deal with the output of the Franckist school, which alone includes works as dissimilar as those of M. Pierre de Bréville and those of M. Magnard—or, to quote two works by the same composer, as M. Vincent d'Indy's 'Symphonie sur un thème Montagnard,' and his pianoforte Sonata; of dramatic composers whose chief aim seems to be to combine symbolism and verism, like M. Bruneau or M. Charpentier; with the so-called impressionist school of M. Debussy and M. Ravel; with prominent young artists like M. Florent Schmitt or M. Antoine Mariotte, who belong to no particular group, but whose individuality is strongly marked.

Turning from French music to Russian, he will find that he cannot dispense with going back to Glinka, whose greater works, almost unknown outside of Russia, will repay study in more ways than one. He must then bestow some time upon the music of Dargomyzhski, make up his mind whether he inclines to side with Tchaikovsky's many admirers or with his few but uncompromising detractors, go deeply into the works of Moussorgsky, Borodin, Balakirev, and Rimsky-Korsakov, which will lay open to him many new problems, and bring him many unsuspected joys. Coming at last to living composers, he will meet with contrasts as marked as those which exist between the music of M. Scriabine and that of M. Stravinsky, both of them leaders of the younger generation. And once again, he will find plenty of work cut out for him.

I do not purpose to enumerate in this article the whole of the material afforded by all schools under the sun. I shall end by briefly considering the present state of things in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, because it is in the study of the output of certain Viennese, Hungarian, or Bohemian composers of to-day that our music-lover will find the most unexpected and most arduous part of his labour to consist.

Mahler's music, for instance, has called forth enough anxiety, enthusiasm, and acrimony to show that, however unsatisfactory it may appear, it deserves at least careful study. Whoever has heard works of M. Arnold Schönberg cannot fail to realise how deeply beset with difficulties is the study of these works. And it would be highly imprudent to make light of the matter: M. Schönberg is a most earnest artist, and the tendencies embodied in his works assert themselves in those of an important group of younger men, like MM. Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Horwitz, Jalowetz, Egon Wellesz. We may also learn, in a near future, the necessity of reckoning with other composers of the Viennese school.

Great interest attaches to the doings of contemporary Hungarian composers who, successfully striving to liberate Hungarian music from Gipsy and other foreign influences, have succeeded in creating a bright and independent school, a school that is, undoubtedly, the youngest in Europe, and is known as yet by a small minority only. They show themselves very daring, and their music is not of the sort in which one feels immediately at ease, although it will not be found as hard to deal with as M. Schönberg's. But if our music-lover takes up the works of M. Bela Bartok or of M. Zoltan Kodaly, it may safely be predicted that he will be in no hurry to lay them aside.

* See E. Newman, 'Debussy on Nationality in Music' (Musical Times, November, 1910); also English Review, June-August, 1912.

But it is impossible to hazard conjectures as to what he will or will not retain and cherish after having made himself acquainted with all modern schools. That he ultimately will, in accordance with his own taste, discard a great number of works which are per se far from indifferent is certain; and it is as certain that from the remainder he will derive a permanent enrichment to his mind, and a joy for ever. These two points: the difficulties attendant upon a comprehensive study of ancient and modern music, and their compensations, are, I believe, clear to all of us. Of the many questions called forth by the tendencies and achievements of modern musicians, a few will form the subject of an ulterior article.

SIGFRID KARG-ELERT.

By A. EAGLEFIELD HULL.

In summarising Karg-Elert's art, we should accord him first place as a harmonist. His originality and invention in this direction are amply proven by the wonderfully beautiful and absolutely novel progressions of many passages, and especially the cadences in his songs and pieces. Scores of striking effects—such as the mediant pedal in the Finale to his Passacaglia in E flat minor for organ, the marvellous use of tonal harmony in the simple little 'Sonata Exotique' for pianoforte, the luxuriant harmonic texture of the 'Cello sonata, the piquant 'Aphorisms,' &c.,—at once occur to mind. Like all bold harmonic innovators, Reger and Strauss not excepted, he occasionally runs to excess and extravagance. In the last two pages of the second Pastel, Op. 92, his emotions seem to lead him almost up to the loss of coherence, but there are few places indeed like this where the discordant mesh is perhaps not quite satisfactorily unravelled.

As a melodist, he will certainly be disappointing to those conservative listeners who do not regard a part as melodious unless it is diatonic, for Karg-Elert is nothing if he is not modern. As a matter of fact he has a wonderful vein of melody: witness the 'long-breathed' solo in the organ Improvisation in E over a sustained soft pedal in the bass; or take any of the songs, the set of three entitled 'To my child,' or the six fervent ones, 'To my wife.' His love too of single melodious parts without accompaniment proves his undoubted melodic vein; the deeply expressive appeal of many of his recitative-like passages is quite wonderful.

In the directions of rhythm and form he is a bold innovator. Whilst his works up to Op. 50 ran on the lines adopted by Brahms, Schumann, and Grieg, with Op. 51 a drastic change commences in which the composer allows his own needs of expression to mould his forms. In the Pianoforte Sonata of this period and in the 'Aphorisms' we find successful experiments in new rhythms worked out in times which themselves are not ordinary,—11-8, 7-4, 5-8, 5-16, &c. In these works may be seen the first move towards a bolder style of utterance, the climax of which he has now reached with his String quartet, Op. 101, in which each part is a satisfactory piece by itself. Surely a unique composition!

Of even greater moment is the distinct advance he has made in the mere technique of the instruments for which he writes. When once the organ had attracted his attention his imagination exercised itself over a wide field, and the publication of his organ works has come as a revelation to the organ-loving community. When the sum of forces in the present Renaissance of organ-playing comes to be added up, the part played by the compositions of Karg-Elert will be no mean one. His 'Phantasie und Fuge, D dur,' Op. 39b, his 'Passacaglia, Es moll,' his '66 Choral-Improvisationen,' the '20 Präludien und Postludien,' the three 'Symphonic Chorales,' the 'Chaconne, Fugue-Trilogy and Choral,' the 'Trois Impressions,' Op. 72, and the 'Drei Pastelle,' Op. 92, are all compositions of the greatest value; and whilst the early 'Passacaglia' consists of a theme subjected to every variety of treatment, it is at the same time dramatic programme music. The later 'Chaconne,' which is obviously influenced by the 'Passacaglia,' gains greatly by its unbroken continuity, and the two long recitative-like passages add considerably to its charm. Some critics might think the ground-bass theme almost too short, but there is no denying the great beauty and originality of the composer's developments of the small phrase, nor the marvellous handling of his climaxes. The addition of the brass and drums for the Finale was, too, a happy thought, but as the cadence is practically the same as that at the end of the 'Chaconne,' one imagines that this gigantic composition, taking half-an-hour in performance, may possibly with advantage be given in two separate parts.

In the 'Choral-Improvisationen' one cannot but marvel at the composer's power of assimilating the form and styles of almost every known organ master up to his own day whilst at the same time expressing his own feelings in a modern way. Schütz, Scheidt, Froberger, Buxtehude, Bach, Mendelssohn, Reger, and even Guilman are all laid under contribution as models for forms in which to pour his modern feelings; and, just as some passages in his later compositions look much like Reger's works, but feel very different, so in his organ treatments of the Choral he breathes a new life into the old forms in quite a marvellous way. Limitations of space prevent the discussion of his influence on organ registering, but it is undeniable that the dissemination of his works, overflowing as they are with novel suggestions, is already producing almost a revolution in this respect. Of course it goes without saying that Bach has been his chief inspiration, and this in other branches beside his organ music. Witness the Sonata and Partita for violin solo without accompaniment; also the three Sonatinas, Op. 67, the 'Reisebilder' (eight Country Scenes), Op. 7, the two books of 'Poetic Bagatelles,' Op. 77, the 'Aphorisms,' Op. 51, all of which form teaching material delightful alike to master and pupil. More pleasing little pieces than the 'Morgensonne,' 'Bächlein,' 'In Bachscher Manier,' and the 'Unser lieben Frau,' it is difficult to imagine. In these simple little pianoforte pieces, as in his more difficult ones, his inventive powers are ever working alongside of his musical fancy, and, in consequence, these works abound with novel digital devices and tone-colour effects.

In the field of free arrangements he has claimed a region all his own. A large number of the clavier works of Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, and Schumann have been adapted to the larger medium of the organ with marvellous insight into the potentialities of organ-playing. He has one mannerism, however, that of preceding an accented note by an ingenious rapid run, a device invented by Wagner and developed by Sinding in order to gain greater rhythmic vitality; but, however, by no means so well-fitted to the more even and powerful tones of the organ. His very latest achievements in the translation of works from one medium to another are his masterly arrangements for the pianoforte of Elgar's two Symphonies.

Modern as are all his present compositions, Karg-Elert is now preparing to go still further and looks forward to producing homophonic works with harmonic streams of a much freer and more independent tonality in place of melodic lines. Typical of his manly and strenuous nature is his view of the great possibilities still lying in the future of the tonal art. 'As a music creator,' he writes, 'I consider myself merely a swimmer, not one who has a "footing." I am fully conscious of the fact that I am only in the midst, or rather at the threshold of a prospect which is still very indistinct, but which becomes clearer and clearer to me with each Opus. Each newly contemplated work appears to me to be on the direct road, but on its completion I cannot help regarding it merely as a fore-study, and I am continually brought face to face with the ardent desire to delete all previous works and re-commence with a new Opus 1.'

To a nature such as this, showing such great capacity for expansion, everything seems possible, and from such a composer who has not yet reached middle age, we may confidently expect great things in the near future.

The following list gives as complete an account as possible of the composer's works up to the present time:

- Op. 1. Symphony, Fa dur.
- Op. 3. Sonata für Pianoforte und Oboe.
- Op. 5. Symphonische Trio.
- Op. 6. Lieder.
- Op. 7. Reisebilder, Eine Suite für Klavier solo.
- Op. 8. Concerto Pathetic, D moll, für Pianoforte und Orchestra.
- Op. 11. Acht Lieder verschiedener Dichter.
- Op. 12. Sechs Lieder im Volkston.
- Op. 14. Drei Sonatinen für Harmonium.
- Op. 25a. Passacaglia, Es moll, für Kunst-Harmonium.
- Op. 25b. Passacaglia, Es moll, für Orgel.
- Op. 26. Kompositionen für Kunstharmonium.
- Op. 26b. Duos für Harmonium und Pianoforte.
- Op. 27. Aquarellen, 5 charakteristische Stücke für Harmonium solo.

- Op. 29. Silhouetten, 7 leichtere Duos für Harmonium und Pianoforte.
- Op. 31. Scenes pittoresques, 12 Charakter-studien für Harmonium solo.
- Op. 31b. Duos für Harmonium und Pianoforte.
- Op. 33. Monologe Fünf Stücke für Harmonium solo.
- Op. 34. Improvisation für Harmonium.
- Op. 34b. Improvisation für Orgel.
- Op. 35. Poesien, 5 Duos für Harmonium und Pianoforte.
- Op. 36. Erste Sonata, H moll, für Harmonium solo.
- Op. 36b. Interludium für Orgel.
- Op. 37. Partita I, D dur, für Harmonium solo.
- Op. 37b. Dieselbe Partita, für Kunstharmonium.
- Op. 38. Schwabenheimat, Ein Zyklus für Pianoforte solo.
- Op. 38b. Duo für Harmonium und Pianoforte. (No. 8 of Op. 38.)
- Op. 39. Phantasie und Fuge, D dur, für Harmonium und Pianoforte.
- Op. 39b. Phantasie und Fuge, D dur, für Orgel solo.
- Op. 40. Gedichte, 'An mein Kind.'
- Op. 42. Madrigale für Harmonium (Kunstharmonium ad lib.).
- Op. 46. Canzone für Orgel.
- Op. 48. Sanctus für Orgel und Violine.
- Op. 48b. Pastorale für Orgel und Violine.
- Op. 50. Erste Pianoforte Sonata, Fis moll, für Pianoforte solo.
- Op. 51. Aphorismen, Ein Zyklus von 17 Skizzen für Pianoforte solo.
- Op. 54. Sechs Gedichte, 'An mein Weib.'
- Op. 56. Zehn Epigramme von Lessing.
- Op. 62. Heft I. Vier Gedichte von Melanie Barth.
- Op. 62. Heft II. Drei Nixenlieder für Alt.
- Op. 63. Impressionen und Gedichte. 3 Hefte.
- Op. 65. Festlicher Choral für Orgel, Trumpeten, Posaunen und Pauken.
- Op. 66. Drei Leiden mit Instrumental Begleitung.
- Op. 67. Drei Sonatinen für Pianoforte.
- Op. 70. Orchestrale Studien für Harmonium.
- Op. 71. Sonata Nr. 1, A dur, für Pianoforte und Violoncello.
- Op. 72. 'Trois Impressions' für Organ.
- Op. 73. Chaconne, Fugue Trilogy and Chorale for Organ.
- Op. 74. First Sonata in A minor.
- Op. 75. Impressions exotiques (Visionen und Naturstim-mungen) für Pianoforte.
- Also Op. 75, No. 1. 'Funeral' for Organ.
- No. 2. Choral-Improvisation on 'In dulci júbilo.'
- Op. 76. Intarsien, 15 kleine Charakterstücke für Harmonium.
- Op. 77. Poetische Bagatellen für Pianoforte.
- Op. 78. Zwanzig Praeludien und Postludien für Orgel.
- Op. 79. Sinfonische Variationen und Fuge (Harmonium).
- Op. 80. Second Pianoforte Sonata.
- Op. 81. Kirchliche Chorkompositionen (mit Begleitung).
- Op. 82. Das Christliche Kirchenjahr (ohne Begleitung).
- Op. 83. Second Harmonium Partita.
- Op. 84. Drei sinfonische Legenden für Violine und Orgel.
- Op. 85. Drei sinfonische Kanzonen für Orgel.
- Op. 87. Drei sinfonische Chorale für Orgel.
- Op. 88. Erste Sonata für Violine allein.
- Op. 89. Partite I, D dur, für Violine allein.
- Op. 90. Zehn leichte Charakterstudien für zwei Violinen.
- Op. 91. Die Kunst des Registrierens für Harmonium.
- Op. 92. Drei Pastelle für Orgel.
- Op. 93. Gradus ad Parnassum für Harmonium.
- Op. 94. Die hohe Schule des Ligatospiels für Harmonium.
- Op. 95. Zwei Psalme (mit Begleitung).
- Op. 96. Zwölfzig Impressionen für Pianoforte.
- Op. 97. Pianoforte Sonata, No. 3.
- Op. 98. Neugeartete Klavierstücke.
- Op. 99. Sinfonische Dialog für zwei Klaviere.
- Op. 100. Sonate für Violine.
- Op. 101. Streichquartett.

Occasional Notes.

At one of the meetings of the Conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, held at Birmingham on December 30 to January 3, Mr. William Wallace read a long paper on 'The Musician and personal responsibility.' In many respects this review of the situation is able and very interesting but it leaves us with the melancholy reflection that the world in which we have to exist is a very reprehensible one. Mr. Wallace is strikingly impartial. Musicians generally are in business matters fools, music publishers are rogues, to say the least of their iniquity. The law is a 'hass,' the Government incredibly obtuse and absurd. No one is spared. He instances the attitude of the profession to the musical piracy scandal as an illustration of apathy. He states that 'not one composer in a position of responsibility considered it his duty to come forward and enter a grave protest against the injury inflicted upon a group of his professional brethren,' and he adds that 'it is difficult to withhold one's scorn from such an attitude,'—but evidently Mr. Wallace does not experience the difficulty. He considers that our leading composers could have put an end to the nuisance in a week.

Mr. Wallace would like to see the organization of an Intelligence Department which should be empowered to speak on behalf of the profession when some measure affecting its interests is brought forward. He says that a striking instance of its being nobody's business to do anything when a serious matter arises, was exemplified by the deplorable inaction displayed by musicians when the Board of Trade appointed its Departmental Committee on Copyright. The composer, whose rights were being dealt with, was not represented on that committee at all. He was 'in the ridiculously unequal position of having his case placed before the committee through the medium of those who were constantly opposed to him—namely, those hereditary enemies of his, the publishers.' Only two musicians ventured to protest, and when the Copyright Bill was in the Committee stage only one (Mr. Wallace himself) ever set foot in the room. Later the 'brazen effrontery' of some publishers in asking composers to make over a substantial portion of their rights in records is denounced. But Mr. Wallace has apparently no opinion to offer on the cases where a publisher spends large sums in making works popular, and thereby creates the commercial value which the record manufacturer, who wants only the popular music, desires to exploit, and may in doing so seriously damage the publisher's admitted interests. It seems, however, vain to suggest to Mr. Wallace that publishers have any moral rights. They are all hopelessly and irretrievably damned.

Another point dealt with by Mr. Wallace was that apparently forlorn hope—the registration of music-teachers. By Order in Council dated February 29, 1912, a Registration Council was constituted and many educational bodies have been elected representatives. There are forty-five members of the Council, and all the musical institutions in the country are represented by one member! Mr. Wallace suggests that if it is not already too late, a drastic step might be taken by the musical bodies named in the Schedule presenting a memorial to the Board of Education, pointing out that as the representation allotted to them is wholly inadequate, they decline to be connected with the Council. Then the profession would have to register itself. But is the profession clear and definite as to what it wants? Has it brought forward a well-considered scheme that deals with the numerous difficulties to be overcome in registering musicians?

A new oratorio, entitled 'The Promised Land,' written by M. Saint-Saëns to a libretto by Mr. Hermann Klein, will be performed for the first time at the Gloucester Three-Choirs Festival. It will be published by Novello & Co. We shall give a full account of this important work in a later issue.

At a recent auction sale of musical autographs in Berlin, some unusually high prices were paid. The list was headed with a manuscript by Handel—a vocal Trio with figured bass, composed at Naples in 1708—which brought over £1,400. Something over £200 was paid for a fragment of a Quartet by Beethoven. A Mazurka by Chopin changed hands at £32, Liszt's 'Rigoletto' Paraphrase was sold for £21, sketches for Haydn's Symphony in D major went at £25. Two letters of Mozart's addressed to his father were acquired by the Musikhistorisches Museum at Cologne, for £85.

The appointment of chorus-master of the Sheffield Musical Festival has been accepted by Mr. J. A. Rodgers, the well-known musical critic of the Sheffield Daily Telegraph and the author of a book on 'The New Choralism.' Mr. Rodgers's career has been largely occupied with the duties of a church organist, but it is the wider study of choral music and choral performance that has chiefly attracted his attention, and earned him the reputation of an expert. He was conductor of the Sheffield Glee and Madrigal Society for seven years, and for the past nine years has shared with Sir Henry Wood the conductorship of the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society. For four seasons he has been honorary conductor of the Sheffield Promenade Concerts. Mr. Rodgers is a prominent member of the Yorkshire section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians.

Dr. Charles Harriss has returned from Canada, and is actively engaged in preparing for the visit of two thousand members of the Imperial Choir of London to the Ghent Exhibition at the end of May. The choir will be the guests of the City. The programmes of their concerts will consist of British music.

Elgar's Violin concerto has been performed with great success at St. Petersburg and Moscow. Kreisler played, and Kussewitzky conducted.

The continuation of the article on 'Equal Temperament' is unavoidably held over.

'What is that tune your daughter is playing?' 'Which daughter?' asked Mrs. Cumrox. 'If it is the older girl it's Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, and if it's the younger girl it's Exercise Twenty-seven.'—Washington Star.

Quint—'So you've written a new song for soprano voice. What's it called?'

Quaver—'Would that I were young again!'

Quint—'Great Scott! You'll never get any woman to sing that.'—Boston Transcript.

The erring compositor is a joy for ever. According to a provincial daily a tenor soloist opened his evening's work in 'Elijah' thus:

Ye people mend your hearts,
Mend your hearts, and not your garments.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.
A MEMORIAL TO SIR GEORGE GROVE.

We are glad to be able to give an illustration of the handsome tablet which has been placed recently in the entrance hall of the Royal College of Music in memory of the first Director, Sir George Grove. It is the gift of Sir Hubert Parry, the present Director of the College. The memorial is a companion tablet to one also placed in the hall of the College in memory of Lord Charles Bruce, who was a very highly esteemed and influential member of the original Council of the College. Both tablets are the work of Messrs. Farmer & Brindley, of 63, Westminster Bridge Road.

Another tablet is placed in the hall as a tribute to the work of George Watson, the inscription of which is as follows:

In memory of George Watson, first Registrar of the Royal College of Music and first Secretary of the Associated Board, whose energy and devotion helped to carry both Institutions through some of the most critical phases of their early existence. Born 1848; appointed 1883; died 1896.

THE BEECHAM OPERA SEASON.

The Beecham opera season has been a most remarkable success from every point of view. Crowded houses have been the rule, but still it is reported on seemingly good authority that even if every seat had been sold for every performance financial success would be impossible. If this is so, it is a fact that should be carefully weighed by those who talk about the prospects of opera with more enthusiasm than knowledge of solid fact. The artistic level of the performances has been high. The best work has undoubtedly been in the performance of 'Der Rosenkavalier,' and apparently the opera has been a great success with the public. The Press criticisms have been remarkably favourable. The newness of the style has not presented the difficulties which might reasonably have been expected to cause hesitation, and it has generally been recognised that Strauss has triumphantly overcome them. What may be called the purple patches—the close of the first Act, the entry of the Rosenkavalier, and the final Trio and Duet—have universally been recognised as among the greatest things in recent music. Some have even gone so far as to place the Trio above the Quintet in 'Die Meistersinger'—whether justly or not time alone can show. Mr. Beecham's interpretation of the score was in many ways original. In no case was it more original than in just those places where he adopted a tempo very much more deliberate than the composer adopts. Mr. Beecham has complained that English critics are apt to follow 'Teutonic opinion' too blindly, so that one has a little diffidence in pointing out that in this case the fact that the composer is German may affect the argument. The libretto has not been favourably criticised as a whole in this country. Possibly the fact that the interpretation of the music is a little more serious than it is when Strauss himself conducts the opera, may have affected the verdict. The performance was extremely brilliant in its principal features. The Marschallin of Frau Siems, the Octavian of Fräulein von der Osten (the original creators of the parts), and the Ochs of Herr Knüpfer are three almost ideal impersonations, and the Sophie of Fräulein Dux is excellent. The smaller parts are all excellently filled.

The revivals of 'Elektra' and 'Salome' have also been full of interest. The Salome of Madame Ackté has from the dramatic point of view developed and ripened, till it has become a remarkably absorbing performance; and the Herod of Herr Costa and the Prophet of Herr Weil were satisfactory without effacing the remembrance of previous interpretations. The outstanding feature of the performance of 'Elektra' was the extraordinarily vivid and powerful Klytemnestra of Frau Bahra von Mildenburg—surely one of the most extraordinary things which the operatic stage of to-day has to show. Frau Mottl-Fassbender's Elektra and the Chrysothemis of Frau Petzl-Perard sank into comparative unimportance by its side, although in themselves deserving a good deal of praise. In both these operas Mr. Beecham has allowed the orchestra to run riot more than was necessary—a good deal more than he did two years ago—and in both cases there was not that clearness of detail which is imperatively necessary for a good performance. The want of gradation and climax at the end of 'Elektra' was particularly noticeable to those who had heard the previous performances.

The performances of the Russian Ballet have exercised their usual fascination on large audiences. At the time of writing two of the new works promised have been produced. The first was a remarkably fantastic and imaginative reproduction of 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' by M. Nijinsky, which is sure to give rise to a good deal of controversy by reason of its boldness. The skill of his reproductions of the attitudes and poses derived from the earliest period of Greek art is extraordinary. As to that there can be no two opinions; but as to their beauty there is a good deal of difference of view. The fact that the scene had to be repeated seems to indicate that the majority is distinctly in its favour. Stravinsky's 'Pétrouchka' is a work of extraordinary originality, both in music and in design. The passions of the semi-human marionettes are depicted in the orchestra with remarkably dramatic power, and the skill with which he reproduces the hurly-burly of the marketplace gives evidence of more than mere talent. The humour of some of his marionette music, especially the love-scene, in which a cornet is accompanied by a bassoon, is of a high order. The miming of M. Nijinsky, in which grotesque comedy and tragedy are combined, is one of the most arresting things which this generation has seen. M. Kotchetovsky as the Moor and Mlle. Karsavina as the Dancer, are extraordinarily clever and attractive, and the whole work is one of the triumphs of the company in the way of artistic decoration and mounting. The popularity of 'L'Oiseau de Feu,' which was produced last summer, is rapidly growing, and the old favourites of the répertoire exercise their wonted fascination.

A. KALISCH.

THE VOCALIST OF THE FUTURE.

The following delightful passage concluding a recent song, 'Herzgewächse,' by the irresistible Arnold Schönberg may, if his theories be correct, afford a perfunctory peep into the vocalisation of the future. The idea is obviously in its infancy. Earlier in the composition the low G $\sharp$ appears in the score. Schönberg's soprano, then, is evidently expected to possess a compass of nearly three octaves. The F in alt, pppp, is a touch of inspiration. The words are by Maeterlinck, but as they do not assist the music they may be avoided. Anybody can invent the accompaniment by playing any chords at any moment below the vocal line that contain a large proportion or even all the notes of the chromatic scale in judicious extension or simultaneously. Care must be taken to avoid any agreement between the intervals.

Church and Organ Music.

THE PEDAL ORGAN.

By ARTHUR T. FROGGATT.

The second article on this subject contributed by Lieut.-Col. Dixon to the pages of the Musical Times, tends to show that the point of difference is not so much the best method of achieving certain results in organ construction, but rather a radical dissimilarity of taste. If this be so, it is of course impossible to find a common ground of agreement. It is generous of Colonel Dixon to draw attention to the fact that the editors of the new critical edition of Bach's Organ Works 'seem to some extent to support' my contention. But there are a few misconceptions in the article which it seems desirable to remove.

Dr. Hopkins does not contend that 'the Pedal should possess its own characteristic tone-quality, in addition to the purely bass-forming function.' His contention is exactly the other way about, as already shown. 'What is required of an efficient Pedal organ is not simply a bass to the Great manual stops, neither more nor less, but a Pedal bass to as many of the leading stops of all the manuals as circumstances will permit.' This great authority regards all else as secondary.

It now appears that when Colonel Dixon referred to 'a suitably developed harmonic structure,' he was thinking of a Pedal mixture. This is not a stop of any very remarkable frequency of occurrence, and the questions of its composition and voicing may be left, for the present, to take care of themselves. Everyone knows that the composition of a Mixture is altered with the ascent in pitch; but the question has really no bearing on the matter under discussion.

'The remark in italics about the use of the open wood uncoupled' as a bass for a few soft stops on the Swell and Choir, has this relevancy to the discussion, that it shows how even a cathedral organist may so accustom his ear to the boom of this stop as to feel unable to play without it.

'Dr. Froggatt's original article quite rightly emphasised the importance of the provision of Pedal solo effects.' In what part of the article is this emphasis to be found? Surely the emphasis is all the other way. Alternative schemes of coupling were suggested: the first, a double-action, by which the coupling of the Pedal to a given manual would simultaneously uncouple it from any other; the second, a single-action, which would allow any number of manuals to be coupled to the Pedal.

To make a practice of playing the subject of a fugue more loudly than the other parts of the counterpoint, whether upon the organ or pianoforte, is most objectionable; although as a very occasional device it may not be in bad taste. That any organist could be found who would draw the Pedal reed whenever the subject appeared in that part, 'the stop being withdrawn immediately the ordinary bass was resumed,' only shows how much our present most inartistic Pedal organ (as I heard one of our cathedral organists describe it not long ago) has to answer for; and how little able is the average organist to resist the temptation to deadly sin which it offers. Such registration, intended for the ears of those who are otherwise unable to recognise the successive entries of the subject, reminds me of the clown of one's childhood, who used to rush upon the stage with the remark 'Here we are again!' It also reminds me of Hamlet's remark to certain Players: 'Now, this overdone, . . . though it make the unskilful laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve; the censure of which one must, in your allowance, o'erweigh a whole theatre of others.'

The other examples mentioned by Colonel Dixon need not detain us long. 'Valet will ich dir Geben' will be quite good on the Swell with Great to Pedal. As for the Passacaglia, I am glad to say I have never heard it with the Pedal tone predominating 'over the manual during half the piece,' and I hope I never shall. With regard to Mendelssohn, this great organ-writer gives tolerably explicit directions for registration; and if he had desired a Pedal reed for 'Aus tiefer Noth,' he would most surely have mentioned it. The suggested treatment of the last variation in the sixth Sonata is another violation of Mendelssohn's directions.

I cannot help being somewhat surprised at Colonel Dixon's anxiety that the most perfect arrangements for trio-playing should be provided on 'ordinary two-manual organs'; and I picture to myself the extreme annoyance of the thousands who play these instruments, when they discover that I have spoiled their Trios, and the complaints which will arise from the very many congregations which have hitherto enjoyed the pleasure of listening to them.

I am far from claiming that my system will provide for every possible variety of registration. But neither will any other that I know of. You cannot carry out the composer's intentions in such a comparatively simple affair as Smart's Festal March, unless you have four manuals. The truth is that the present miserable system is responsible for a great deal of the inartistic registration in vogue, as (I venture to think) Colonel Dixon has, quite unintentionally, amply demonstrated.

Now we come to 'the first eighteen bars of Bach's great G minor Fugue.' Colonel Dixon's directions are not very clear, because, with the Great coupled to the Pedal, the experiment is impossible. Assuming, however, that he intends the manual parts to be played upon the Great open diapason, with the Pedal part first on the open wood uncoupled, and secondly upon the Great diapason an octave lower than written (in this case the manual being coupled to the Pedal and no Pedal stop drawn), I can only say that if he prefers the former to the latter effect, I do not agree with him. Neither effect is that intended by the composer, because in both cases the Pedal notes are not heard as written. And the experiment is a totally different one from that which I suggested.

No amount of ingenuity can reconcile the opinions of Dr. Hopkins and Colonel Dixon regarding the Pedal open diapason on the Doncaster organ. The former described it as 'a magnificent specimen.' The latter asserts that the Doncaster Pedal suffers from 'a general lack of effect in relation to the rest of the organ.' Would Hopkins have described one of the most important stops on the Pedal organ as 'a magnificent specimen' had he found that department to suffer from 'a general lack of effect in relation to the rest of the organ'? Can that be a fine organ (which is Hopkins's description of it in Grove's Dictionary) in which a Pedal of 25 stops is inferior to the manuals? Here again the difference is surely one of taste.

The point in proving the existence of a manual counterpart to the Pedal open bass lies in this—that it knocks the bottom out of Colonel Dixon's contention that it is not the essential function of the Pedal to provide a bass to as many of the manual stops as possible. I mentioned a few instances, and my critic is good enough to supply me with another. I am inclined to think that he is not familiar with Dr. Wesley's organ at St. Giles's, Camberwell, which contains (or did contain) a special coupler, 'wood open to pedals separately.' There can be no question but that the Pedal open diapason is intended to be the continuation, whether appropriately or not, of the Great stop of the same name. Either or both have been made of metal; either or both have been made of wood, wholly or in part. To the open diapason (wood) on the Great organ at St. Paul's Cathedral I made no reference whatever.

Colonel Dixon says that I 'originally claimed economy, as well as simplification and saving of space'; but that 'it now looks as if these claims have been virtually abandoned.' As this is a complete misrepresentation, although I am sure an unintentional one, of what I have previously written, I am compelled to go over some of the old ground once more.

In my first article, this passage occurs: 'thirdly, stop for stop, there would be a saving of space and also of expense. Whether the Pedal organ consisted of few or many stops, the saving of space would be considerable, seeing that each stop available on the Pedal would mean twelve pipes instead of thirty. Although the largest pipes would remain, still the saving of space occupied by the other eighteen would be something gained. And the expense of the new mechanism would be much less than that of the additional pipes; the difference in cost increasing, of course, according to the number of Pedal stops.' Observe, the difference in cost; that is to say, inasmuch as the same action is required for one stop as for ten, an organ which provided a Pedal bass for every stop of the three manuals, if built according to my system, would be relatively cheaper than one which provided a Pedal bass for any less number of stops on each manual: comparing the cost of both organs with instruments constructed according to any of the present systems. And then I continue: 'On the other hand, pipe for pipe, the new arrangement would be immensely superior to the old. At present 120 pipes on the Pedal mean four stops; but if my suggestion were adopted, 120 pipes on the Pedal would mean ten stops; and although in this case the cost of the organ would of course be greater, the resources of the Pedal would be more than doubled, while its efficiency would be increased to an extent which cannot be expressed in mere figures.'

In my second article this passage occurs: 'It is perhaps unnecessary to repeat that a Pedal of 120 pipes on my system would be much more expensive than one of the same number of pipes on the present system; but if any ten stops of an organ containing, say, twenty-six stops on three manuals are to be carried through on the Pedal clavier—that is to say, are to be provided with suitable basses—my system would be cheaper than the present clumsy method of duplicating pipes that are very little used. It would not only be cheaper, but far more artistic.' I submit that this passage gives Colonel Dixon no right to say that 'it now looks as if these claims [of economy] have been virtually abandoned.'

Pace Colonel Dixon, the borrowing of a 16-ft. manual stop can never provide a suitable bass for the Swell. Unless the stop is in the swell-box, it cannot be equally suitable if the swell be closed or open. If the stop is in the box, its scale will render it unsuitable for Pedal use in identical pitch; while of course it ceases to be effective as a Pedal stop if it be drawn for the manual. No adequate Pedal can thus be provided for the Swell open diapason; therefore this use of such stops has no real bearing upon my proposals.

Colonel Dixon's next paragraph is, I must maintain, absolutely incomprehensible. The pipes of the 8-ft. octave of any stop cannot be 'relatively strong,' and 'relatively weak' as against another octave of the same stop, at one and the same time, however employed. Let me quote the passage from the Colonel's first article: 'A Pedal entry above middle C would be relatively so weak as to be scarcely discernible while playing on the Great organ. This defect is likely to be still further exaggerated owing to the unfortunate tendency in many instances not only to increase the 8-ft. tone out of all proportion to the rest of the organ, but also to make the tenor and bass octaves of such stops unduly large.' The whole passage is obscure, for there is not one octave for the bass and another for the tenor, in addition to the 8-ft. octave. But if the 8-ft. tone is increased 'out of all proportion to the rest of the organ,' it can only have the effect, when employed on the Pedal in octaves with the 4-ft. tone, of augmenting the power of the Pedal. The tenor going below the bass could not possibly affect the result, as claimed by my critic, because the tenor would not touch the 8-ft. octave in one such case out of a thousand. Therefore, I repeat the passage quoted contradicts its own argument.

With regard to independent Pedal stops, I should have thought my position was perfectly clear from the outset. In my first paper I wrote: 'There is no reason why one or more independent Pedal stops of thirty notes should not be included in the specification of a large organ, as before. . . . However, for my own part, these, except perhaps in the case of very large organs, seem to be superfluous.' In my second paper I repeated this opinion. My ideal organ is one in which every manual stop (not clavier) is carried down an octave lower than at present, and rendered available upon the Pedal, in identical and double pitch, simultaneously and separately. With that I should be perfectly content. Something much short of it would be preferable to the specification of any Pedal organ that I know of.

Colonel Dixon has written at considerable length on the subject of fugue-playing, trio-playing, and the production of Pedal solo effects generally. He appears to forget that ninety-nine out of every hundred organs are situated in places of worship, and that the infinitely most important part of the organist's duty is to accompany vocal music. It cannot be too often repeated that what the organist requires from the Pedal above all else is a suitable bass, instantaneously available, for the constant alternations between Choir, Great, and Swell, which ecclesiastical music demands. At present, on the vast majority of organs he cannot obtain it; and in the comparatively few cases in which he can, the problem involves a constant change of registration for two distinct organs, when it ought to require it for only one.

I am happy in agreeing with Colonel Dixon upon one point—that an ounce of practice is worth a ton of theory. But it is just because of the (pecuniary) value of this ounce of practice that there will be probably some difficulty in persuading organ-builders to take the matter up. Experiments cost money. Could I afford it, I would lose no time in having an organ built in accordance with my theory. As it is, there are many indications of at least some approach to this consummation. Possibly the day is not so very far distant when it may be reached.

Elgar's 'The Apostles' will be performed at Holy Trinity Church, Southport, on March 14, by a choir and orchestra of 150 performers, under the direction of Mr. Arthur W. Speed.

THE ORGAN AT ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH, HAMBURG.

BY THE REV. J. T. LAWRENCE.

Up till a few months ago there were in existence several instruments, each with its own claim to special notice as being the most remarkable of all contemporary organs. Many times, in these columns especially, there have been considered the rival claims of the Sydney organ, those in the St. George's Hall at Liverpool, the Royal Albert Hall, the Colston Hall, the Cathedral at Garden City, U.S.A., the Continental organs in Riga, Ulm, Libau, Dortmund, Berlin, and others. Some were compared with regard to the number of pipes, others, with more reason, came to the front by reason of the amount of 8-ft. work. Sometimes the number of sounding stops was the basis of comparison, and inasmuch as each organ had its own points of excellence, the comparison soon became unprofitable, if not impossible. However, the question has been put to rest in the most conclusive manner by the celebrated firm of E. & F. Walcker, of Ludwigsburg, who have just completed, for St. Michael's Church, Hamburg, an organ which from every possible point of comparison easily outstrips every other organ built; exceeding by some forty sounding stops and 5,000 pipes the previous largest.

When completed, the Liverpool organ, the specification of which appeared in the January Musical Times, will probably dispute the claim of the Hamburg instrument to be considered the largest in the world. It will however probably be three years or more before the latter is challenged. Meanwhile it is a remarkable coincidence that almost at the same moment there should be published by German and English builders, schemes so far surpassing in their comprehensiveness anything hitherto even conceived in the organ-building world.

When considering organs of such unprecedented resources as the two referred to, it does not seem to be very profitable to argue with any degree of minuteness which of the two is the larger. For the sake of the curious we print tabular statements of those particulars in which comparisons may be made. Whilst the Liverpool organ will have the larger number of draw-stops, it will be much inferior in the total number of pipes. This is due to the fact that the German tone composition generally provides for a much more liberal 'chorus' department than is the custom in England. And again, several of the manuals possess the extra octave of pipes designed to make the octave-coupler effective. As to the comparative cost, it has to be remembered that the Hamburg organ includes its case, and the Liverpool organ will have four chief fronts, one each north and south and two west, yet to be estimated.

Total	163 stops	12,173	12,173

In addition to the above 163 sounding stops, all but about half-a-dozen of which ran through, there are 125 accessory movements, including couplers, unison, octave and sub-octave, combination pedals, and pistons.

The third, fourth, and fifth manuals are enclosed in boxes with vertical louvres, with the exception of the heavy reeds on the third manual, and, as described above, the fifth manual has its appropriate enclosed pedal.

The names in the above list are translations from the German into the nearest English equivalent. There are some, however, for which no adequate translation can be found, e.g., 'Synthetaphon,' and one or two others representing German experiments in tone-production which have not found imitations in this country, e.g., 'Night Horn.'

It is difficult to criticise the total tone composition without very intimate knowledge of the location and local conditions. We note the absence of any stop of 32-ft. pitch from the manuals, and the absence of a 32-ft. open wood from the Pedal is noteworthy. The 32-ft. wood stop in that department is labelled 'Gross Gedact Bass,' which, if it means anything, means a Contra Bourdon. However, we are open to correction on this point. The 32-ft. stop on the 'Fern-werk' pedal appears, from its label, to be Harmonic.

Again, out of 163 sounding stops there are but 29 reeds! The organ in the Royal Albert Hall has 38 reeds out of 111 stops—more than a third of the total; and the Liverpool organ by the same builders, 34 out of 100, exactly the same proportion. The Sydney organ by Hill possesses 33 out of 126. The Liverpool organ will have 54 out of 167.

We also note for an organ of this size the moderate amount of mutation work compared with the German practice of even twenty-five years ago. There are some 84 ranks of chorus. The Leeds organ has but 32, and the Liverpool organ 48 such ranks.

The organ in St. Michael's Church, described in Hopkins and Rimbault, was burned in 1906. It was an immense instrument, of three manuals and pedal, and possessing 70 sounding stops and between 5,000 and 6,000 pipes.

The contract for this organ was given to Silbermann, but he very shortly afterwards died, and it was built by his principal workman, Hildebrand, in 1762, so that exactly a century and a half has elapsed.

In a descriptive pamphlet Messrs. Walcker print side by side the façades of the old and the new organs, and in all but the merest details they are similar. A feature of both is the treatment of the 32-ft. open metal pipe, which is 22-in. in diameter and 36-ft. in height. It stands in the centre by itself in an immense pilaster, and is surmounted by a medallion and again by carved angelic figures. It is treated like a Corinthian column, of which the body of the pipe is the shaft. The rest of the 32-ft. open metal rakes down on either side in two concave curtains, and in the old organ each pipe was treated in a similar way, that is to say, the feet of the pipes were enclosed each in its own pediment and the top of each was finished with a Corinthian cornice. In the present instrument there is not the same attempt to disguise the fact of an organ-pipe.

The console is separated from the body of the instrument, and the registers are controlled, in six concave rows on either side and one row over the fifth manual, by tablets. Under the manuals are in all 30 pistons, eleven of which operate on the registers of the first manual. Twenty-eight composition pedals, three swell pedals, and a crescendo device, divide the attention of the organist's feet with the 32 keys of the Pedal organ. Externally the console is very attractive, being very richly carved.

The fifth manual 'Fern-werk' is a very effective echo. The sound-boards are right away in the roof far above the rest of the organ, and the appropriate pedal stands alongside. This organ derives its wind from a rotary blower immediately behind it. The air in the roof is likely to be of a considerably higher temperature than that from which the main wind supply is taken. To judge from the ground plan and elevation there is nothing quite like this Echo organ anywhere else, for the egress of sound is not only controlled by the usual swell louvres, but by gratings and shutters cunningly arranged around the chamber in which it is located.

The solo reeds are disposed horizontally at the back of the instrument, high up, so that the sound is not impeded by the case pipes.

Only by the co-operation of electricity and compressed air could such an instrument as this be in the slightest degree manageable.

There is a smaller organ—an auxiliary organ it is called—which is used on minor occasions. This possesses two manuals of five octaves and a pedal CCC-f. The second manual has the extra octave of pipes. There are 14 stops on the Great, 16 on the Swell, and 10 on the Pedal, 2,640 pipes in all, and 39 coupling arrangements and accessories.

Mendelssohn's 'As the hart pants' was sung at the close of the evening service at St. Silas', Waverley Park, S.E., on February 9. Mr. J. Arnold Dunn was the organist, and the soloists were Mr. Charles T. O. Trotman and Master Cecil Hookway. Mr. J. Arnold Dunn also gave an organ recital in the afternoon.

A SCHOOL OF CHURCH MUSIC.

For the first time since its formation in 1885, the House of Laymen for the Province of Canterbury, which has been sitting at the Church House on February 18 and 19, contemporaneously with Convocation, has had on its agenda paper a motion relative to Church music. The motion was last on the list and was unfortunately not reached; and this and other business was adjourned until the next session of the House, which may not be held for some months to come.

Mr. Royle Shore, one of the Birmingham representatives in the House, who holds certain honorary musical appointments in connection with the Cathedral and Diocese, and who has recently contributed a series of articles to these columns on the old harmonized chants of the Church of England, was the author and intended proposer of the Resolution, which runs as follows:

'That in view of certain tendencies in modern music, and the existing chaos as regards the standards of our parochial church music, it has become urgently necessary, for these and other reasons, that the question of the music of the Church of England should be taken under the immediate consideration of this House.

'That this House, so far as the facts are before it, approves of the establishment of a school of ecclesiastical music on a broad basis, as a means of promoting some of the many reforms which appear to be greatly needed, and commends the support of such a school to the liberality of the members of this House, and churchmen generally, and suggests that it has also strong claims for assistance from the funds of the Church, if any should be found, directly or indirectly, available for this purpose.

'That a committee be and is hereby formed to watch, and, if need be, co-operate with the movement now on foot for the promotion of a school, or any other movement having substantially the same object which may be initiated, or any societies having the cause of our church music at heart, and to report to this House from time to time, such committee to have power to add to its number, including the addition of experts from outside this House.'

There are schools of Ecclesiastical music in Paris, the Schola Cantorum associated with the name of M. Vincent D'Indy, whose career has been recently noticed in this paper, and at Ratisbon, but there is nothing of the kind in this country.

Birmingham is suggested as the initial home of the School, which proposes to supplement the work of the Department of Music at the University and at the Birmingham School of Music, and is understood to have received the cordial approval of Mr. Granville Bantock as University Professor, and the Bishop of Birmingham.

Mr. H. Goss-Custard, organist of St. Saviour's Church, Ealing, has recently received a high tribute to his musical skill from the firm of Herr M. Welte & Son, of Freiburg, Germany. The manager, who happened to be in England a few weeks ago, attended one of Mr. Goss-Custard's organ recitals, and invited him to make a record for the Welte-Mignon organ. Mr. Goss-Custard is the first Englishman to be thus privileged.

The fifth of the monthly meetings of the Glasgow Society of Organists was held in the Athenæum on the evening of February 1, when the following short and excellent papers were given: (1) 'The necessity for organists to study orchestration,' by Mr. A. Dinsdale; (2) 'Humanity and music (with special reference to Bach),' by Mr. W. McDougall; (3) 'Our organist,' by Mr. R. Felvus Henn; (4) 'The organist, with regard to congregational singing,' by 'Anonymous.' There was a good attendance, and all the papers were very much appreciated.

At the annual dinner of the choir of St. Augustine's Church, South Croydon, which took place on January 18, at the Greyhound Hotel, Croydon, Mr. Frank Twyford was the recipient of a diamond pin, together with an illuminated address, signed by members of the choir and congregation, as a mark of gratitude for his faithful and valuable services to the choir during the past twenty-five years.

The special music during Lent and at Easter at St. John's, Wilton Road, includes the following: Allegri's 'Miserere,' Fridays, at 8 p.m.; on Good Friday, Palestrina's 'Reproaches,' at 11 a.m. and Bach's 'Passion' (St. John) at 8 p.m.; on Easter Day, Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle' (with orchestra), at 11 a.m.

The gentlemen of the choir of Holy Trinity, Lee, held their annual dinner last month at Anderson's Hotel, Fleet Street. Mr. Ernest G. White, organist and director of the choir, presided, and was the recipient of a presentation.

An interesting series of organ recitals is in progress at St. Stephen's, Walbrook, E.C., and is attracting a crowded attendance. The organ is a fine specimen of Messrs. Hill's work, and is remarkable for its variety and beauty of tone. The arrangements for March are as follows: 6th, Mr. F. W. Holloway; 7th, Mr. Stanley Marchant; 13th, Mr. T. J. Crawford; 14th, Sir Frederick Bridge; 20th, Mr. R. Meyrick Roberts; 27th, Mr. Edward Potter.

A highly creditable performance of Sullivan's sacred oratorio 'The Prodigal Son' was given under the conductorship of Mr. F. Frohock at the Histon Baptist Church, Cambridge, on February 6, to a full and appreciative audience. The soloists were Mrs. G. Green, Miss Doris Pedley, Mr. H. S. Sharp (St. John's College Choir), and Mr. G. W. Blackall, all of whom sang well. The choir, consisting of combined choirs from Histon and Cottenham, did their work efficiently and expressively. An orchestra accompanied. The performance concluded with Handel's 'Hallelujah Chorus.'

The annual Oratorio Concerts recently held at Salem Baptist Church, Porth (Rhondda Valley), were much appreciated, the works performed this time being the 'Requiem Mass' (Mozart), and 'Hiawatha's departure' (the late Coleridge-Taylor). A large organ and an orchestra of fifteen instrumentalists supplied the accompaniments, the choir numbering about 170 voices. For the tenth year in succession, Mr. T. D. Edwards presided at the organ, while Mr. Rhys Evans again conducted. The vocalists were Madame Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Esther Cooper, Mr. Hughes-Macklin, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Excellent interpretations were given of both works before crowded audiences. A miscellaneous concert was also given, when organ solos were contributed by Mr. T. D. Edwards, and the vocalists named sang various solos and duets, which were well received.

Reviews.

Interpretation in Song. By H. Plunket Greene.

[The Musician's Library: Stainer & Bell.]

Coming from the source that it does, this book is certain of a cordial welcome. As an interpreter of song, Mr. Plunket Greene occupies a quite unique position. His first appearances as a singer are well within the memory of the younger generation of concert-goers, and it will not be forgotten that his particular art and style struck, at that time, an entirely fresh and personal note. No one was then quite like him, nor for the matter of that, is so now. His vividness of expression and his grip of the psychology of the songs that he sang were, in England at least, new phenomena. Since then, we have all reaped where he sowed, and now happily demand as a standard, the ideal that he then, and has consistently since, set before us. His contemporaries, and singers coming after him, were not slow to profit by his example—some indeed have frequently paid him the homage of imitation in directions that he would himself be the first to deprecate; but all alike have benefited, and in considering this book—his harvest, so to speak—a grateful recognition of what is owed to him should be its introduction.

It contains, as was to be expected, valuable help for all those who are intelligent and hard-working enough to follow its advice, and though filled with genuine conviction and serious purpose, there runs through it all a delightful stream of gaiety. Mr. Greene writes in an unaffected, straightforward, and often breezy way, pointing what he has to say by happy and frequently amusing similes drawn from everyday life. But if in his easy humour we find him an Irishman, he is a poet too, and is as ready to turn aside into the bypaths of the imagination as he is to remain on the highway of common-sense.

It may be said with perfect truth, that an interpreter, who is at least brother to the poet, is like him, born and not to be made; but the only people who are worth teaching are those that already know, and Mr. Greene finds points of communication with the neophyte even in the most elusive matters, such, for instance, as the subjects of his first chapters, in which he writes of Magnetism, Sense of Atmosphere, Tone-colour, and Style. Here, among many other practical things, we find particular insistence upon the necessity of 'thinking of a song as a whole,'—'in large,' as he puts it. An obvious thing of course, but one that is often apt to be overlooked, or overlaid by subtleties. A performance possessing the qualities of breadth and complete relevance is the unerring mark of a mature artist. It was one of the powers so easily at the command of Hans Richter; and those who have sung or played with him will remember his stern repression of all disturbing or extraneous detail, and will recall epic evenings when, in a work of the greatest magnitude, everything, every phrase, has borne its proper mould and impress. The comparative rarity of such experiences, and also of the general apprehension of these distinguishing features in themselves, make Mr. Greene's observations particularly necessary and welcome.

The section on Tone-colour contains a detailed analysis of Mr. Greene's own interpretation of the 'Twa sisters of Binnorie,' in which we are given a suggestive outline of the play of colour and feeling that characterize his actual performance; probably, however, all reduced to writing and completely defined consciousness, here for the first time. Apart from their interest, the point doubtless of this and the numerous analyses that are given elsewhere, is that of driving in upon the singer some sense of the concentrated intention that should lie behind his work, of the delving into the composer's and poet's meaning that must be done before an interpretation becomes a living reality.

A large part of the book is devoted to the expounding of Mr. Greene's three 'Main rules.' The first of these, 'Never stop the march of a song' (enforced by a delightful quotation from Richard II.), embraces rhythm in all its aspects—the rhythm that involves a sense of accent in every beat, the rhythm that is 'like a piston,' its function too in driving forward the musical structure.

'True rhythm is inexorable; true rhythm is compelling; true rhythm is ever on the move, and ever in a straight line . . . it is the secret of the singing of every song, big or little, fast or slow; be it as harassed as the Erlking, or as lazy as Feldeinsamkeit, it pushes on in a straight line to its goal, inevitably.'

In speaking of the related capacity of singing long phrases, Mr. Greene puts the matter upon its right basis by insisting that this is primarily due to 'will-power,' rather than to the faculty of taking in an abnormal quantity of breath. Will-power, however, superposed upon a correct method of breathing. This—as Mr. Greene defines it—is, when freely done, the simple action known to all good singers; but many of them will probably prefer to use the free expansion of the lower ribs, followed by the automatic fixing of the 'breathing muscle,' rather than the reverse order that he prescribes.

Although mainly written for those who are about to enter upon a public career, there is no doubt that the book will be read widely by the 'old hand' as well as the new. It cannot fail to stimulate, and there are some things in it that cut deeper and that belong to life as all who strive for any ideal know it; for we have here, as Mr. Greene in his preface says, 'the experiences of one who has been through the mill, who by loyalty to his rules has tried hard to atone for the shortcomings of his equipment, and they are primarily meant for the man who, having served his apprenticeship, is starting out into the world on his own. There are no short cuts in art, but if it helps to make the road to the dim Parnassus any smoother, or gives him a tune to whistle to his stride, or best of all, shows him fresh lands to explore, the book will have served its purpose.'

FREDERIC AUSTIN.

Light's glittering morn. Anthem for Easter. Composed by John E. West.

Benedictus. In the key of F major. Composed by John Ireland.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. West's anthem is one of the best of the many good things he has done. The vocal parts are excellently placed, while the organ part is dignified and very effective, even on a small instrument. We particularly like the middle section, with its flowing part-writing and the subdued accompaniment, the whole lending contrast to the vigorous treatment of the first and last sections. The anthem is well within the capacity of most choirs of any resource, and though the means employed are comparatively simple, the effect will be of importance and entirely suitable to the joyous season for which it is written. Mr. Ireland adds the Benedictus to his already published Te Deum in the same key, and the many excellent characteristics of the latter work are fully maintained. He is one of the few modern writers who can be original without being strained or unnatural, and his work generally has only to become known to be widely appreciated and made use of. We look with interest for the completion of the Service.

SONGS.

A Song of the Virgin Mother. By Edgar L. Bainton.

When I saw Chloe's face. By C. M. Spurling.

The smile of Spring. By Percy E. Fletcher.

Song of the fugitives. By Howard Carr.

When all the world is young. By John Pointer.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

A verse translated by Ezra Pound from the Spanish of Lope de Vega has inspired Mr. Bainton with a musical setting of considerable beauty and tenderness of sentiment. The gentle, cradle-like swaying in the accompaniment and the idiom which conveys a sense of aloofness impart truth to this 'Song of the Virgin Mother.'

'When I saw Chloe's face' is a conscientious song in which effect is obtained by simple means. In 'The smile of Spring' Mr. Percy Fletcher draws upon familiar resources—a process from which he has the happy knack of producing something new and popular every time. The high note is A. 'The song of the fugitives' is sturdy British music, with a gallop in the accompaniment. A resounding baritone voice and a sense of rhythm are sufficient to give it good effect.

Mr. Pointer's setting of Charles Kingsley's verses gives abundant opportunities to a vocalist of expressive faculties. The melody is straightforward and well turned, and the accompaniment shows how much refined detail can be secured within the bounds of simplicity.

Varied Harmonies for Organ Accompaniment (and voices ad libitum) of certain tunes in 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.'

[William Clowes & Sons, Ltd.]

The Rev. J. Lionel Bennett has been successful in his attempt to provide organists with a selection of varied harmonies for the unisonal singing of verses of certain hymns. Besides his own contributions, the series is enriched by the work of Sir Charles Stanford, Dr. Charles Wood, Mr. Charles Macpherson, Dr. Harford Lloyd, Dr. Buck, Dr. Huntley, Dr. Vaughan Williams, and others. Some of these have been remarkably successful, and special mention should be made of Sir Charles Stanford's setting of the tune 'St. Ann,' his use of the rhythmic device in the last movement of Bach's 'St. Ann' Fugue being most happy and appropriately effective. Sir Charles's harmonic treatment of the grand old tune 'O Filii et Filiae' is singularly fine, and in every bar shows the hand of the expert. Dr. Wood's unerring instinct is shown in several examples, the six-part writing in the last verse of 'Southwell' being a conspicuous instance.

Mr. Charles Macpherson is well-known as an adept at improvising a varied organ accompaniment, and it is especially valuable to read his thoughts in the very skilful setting of 'Forty days and forty nights,' and 'Bright the vision that delighted,' the peroration in the former at the words 'At the eternal Eastertide' being an inspiration. Dr. Lloyd's clear style is well illustrated by his contribution to the work, and will, with those of other writers, no doubt appeal to many who prefer a more direct method. There are other examples equally worthy of mention, and the whole book is full of interest. It was a happy idea to include the Choral from Mendelssohn's 'Lobgesang,' for it exactly illustrates what is wanted in varied accompaniment. The book could not have been considered complete without examples from John Sebastian Bach, who, Mr. Bennett truly says in the preface, 'revealed his genius not least in his treatment of hymn-tunes.' It should be added that Mr. Bennett has contributed many admirable specimens of his own. The work is certain of wide recognition for its scope and variety.

Precept and Practice for Singing-Class Students. By J. A. Moonie.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Moonie is an Edinburgh professor of great experience. He has for many years prepared students in Training Colleges for their musical duties. He finds that many existing manuals and instruction-books on sight-singing are cumbersome and redundant, and unnecessarily slow in coming to the point. There is a good deal of truth in this statement, and certainly no one will accuse Mr. Moonie of roundabout methods. He adopts the movable doh system, and some of the exercises are in Tonic Sol-fa notation. The work is comprehensive in scope without being over-long. The instruction is sugared with some humour of the variety generally called 'pawky.'

Correspondence.

'WAGNER AND SUPER-WAGNER.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Quo tendimus? Whither are our critics leading us? We know, of course, that they must be right—it is their business to be—but a poor musician like myself must be excused for feeling bewildered with his teachers of to-day. A few months ago I held up to derision in your columns the lucubrations of a man who wrote nothing but a series of incongruous notes, and I was gravely rebuked by Mr. Clutsum, who called this 'the logical development of harmony.' The other day I heard a piece by a composer, the whole of whose works I know well, and whose mental decadence I have long deplored. This latest product of his wrecked intelligence distressed me beyond measure, but was held up to admiration by the critics of the Daily Mail and Daily Telegraph, these gentlemen in the same breath praising Beethoven's Violin concerto and a primitive Symphony by Haydn, which were the other items on the programme. Now if Scriabine's 'Prometheus' is music, then it is idle to pretend that the other works are also music, for you cannot name a point in which the two styles are not absolutely contradictory. I do not say that the Cubists or Futurists are wrong—an artist's views on art are, of course, valueless—but if a man says he admires Bucciotti or Severini, and also Raphael and Michael Angelo, I say . . . well, I would rather not say what I say.

And now on the top of this exasperation comes Mr. Ernest Newman, who is supposed to know all about art matters, occupying more than eight of your valuable pages with one of the strangest, un-Wellsian (if I may coin a word) forecasts of music in the future that ever was heard of. I call it un-Wellsian, because it seems so contrary to natural evolution or logical development (pace Mr. Clutsum) in art. I gather that he looks for 'a form of quasi-dramatic music in which we shall be rid of all, or most, of the mere scaffolding of narration or action that serves at present simply to give intellectual support to the music of opera.' I like that word 'simply,' it tells me so much. It tells me that the esteemed critic really believes that music can exist as such without intellectual support—that it is a state—a mood—an epileptic seizure—a trance. But these deplorable accessories of opera—the libretto and the singers—is not their existence due to evolution? To discard them would be something analogous to the procedure of the writers of 'Gems from the Classics' who discard the pudding and keep the plums, only to discover that the result is bathos. So have well-meaning literary persons endeavoured to eliminate the verbosity from Scott and Dickens with equally dire result. To come closer to Mr. Newman's idea, one beholds a composer making a tart that shall be all jam and have none of that nasty pastry about it. Believe a practical person: it would only be more difficult of digestion. I am glad to believe the idea chimerical.

Mr. Newman is really trying to imagine a simple form of art superseding a highly complex form. I well remember, just thirty-one years ago, when musical London was staggering under the assault of Wagner, hearing at a public dinner the future of music forecasted by several eminent men, the late Joseph Bennett and the present head of Novello's among them. The opinion most favoured was that in another twenty-five years a reaction would take place to a simple, solid style. The wish was doubtless father to the thought among these Handel-lovers; but I, as a modest young man should, imitated the behaviour of Brer Rabbit—'I lay low an' sed nuffin.' And the pen is now hardly dry in Mr. Newman's hand when out comes Strauss's new opera with more libretto and more accessories than ever. Speculations on the future are rather a futile business, as Mr. Chesterton has excellently shown in his 'Napoleon of Notting Hill'; but one thing one may prophesy with certainty about music: its evolution will always be in the direction of increased complexity. When the forecast I speak of was made it was thought that Brahms and Raff (!) had said the last word in abstract music. Then came along Dvorik, Tchaikovsky, and César Franck, and revealed new phases of our art: a still more recent new-comer, whom it is not for me to name (not being a critic), will presently make even Brahms a back number.

One must not reason from the particular to the general. Mr. Newman, I venture to think, is a little sweeping in his contempt for opera-books. Is he a librettist perchance, like so many of his kind? I fancy that there are librettists not devoid of merit from other pens than those of Richard Wagner and Hofmannsthal. Has Mr. Newman ever read 'Fervaa' or 'L'étranger' by Vincent d'Indy, or that marvellous Greek trilogy 'Hippodamia' by Dr. Vrchlicky? I could even name at least three music-poems of the very highest merit from English pens, but this would be useless, as these are never likely to see the light. All these works are on different planes and have little kinship to those so trenchantly disposed of by Mr. Newman. Of course the poet and the musician always dream of a work which shall be all meat and no bones, just as the ordinary human being yearns for a Heaven where there shall be nothing but joy, forgetting that so long as we are human all our concepts are relative, so that we cannot have joy without sorrow, an umbrella without a stick, or an opera without padding. Yet Mr. Newman presents as his ideal a kind of symphonic-poem that shall be all interest. But why is the symphonic-poem—that excuse for all unskillful craftsmanship—to be our ideal? Not so long ago our critics scoffed at it, and the man who read psychology or theosophy into music was considered a crack-brained idiot. Now we are all for 'soul-states' and 'expression of personality' and 'inner-meanings' which have to be explained. When a man tells me seriously that 'there are thousands of pages in Bach that only yield up their full secret to us when we get some outside light upon the sequence of poetic ideas in his mind at the time of writing—this is the case with many of the Choral Preludes, for example?—when he tells me this, I say, I hardly know whether to be more sorry for Bach or for him. At any rate it makes me wonder whether my life's experience of music has all been thrown away and—if Mr. Newman will pardon the quotation—it makes me doubtful as to 'the importance of being Ernest.'—Yours faithfully,

F. CORDER.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—In the February number of the Musical Times (p. 85) I read the following sentence: 'In the "Christmas Oratorio" Bach sets the words of a chorale addressing the infant Jesus to the music of another chorale that was already associated in the minds of the congregation with the Passion, —thus in a flash bringing the death of the Saviour into the same mental picture as the birth.' I have read a similar statement elsewhere, and therefore venture to point out to Mr. Newman and his predecessors and successors that it rests on the erroneous assumption that the tune known to English audiences from the Passion music of Bach is essentially connected with the hymn 'O Thou with hate surrounded.' It is really the tune of the Communion hymn 'Herzlich tut mich verlangen,' but is used for a variety of hymns, such as 'O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden,' 'Befiehl du deine Wege,' 'Wie soll ich Dich empfangen,' and others. The result is that to the German mind it conveys no particular association, just because it is so frequently used and at the most varied occasions. Even in the 'St. Matthew' Passion Bach uses it for the chorale 'Whate'er may vex or grieve thee,' which has nothing to do with the Passion. It was only natural that he should have introduced it into the 'Christmas Oratorio' in connection with a hymn which his audience must have sung every Sunday during Advent ('Wie soll ich Dich empfangen') to the same tune. English audiences, which know the tune chiefly through the Passions, may be excused in finding a mystic allusion in the Christmas Oratorio, but it may be safely asserted that Bach never intended to establish such a connection of ideas, and if he had he must have failed in his endeavour.

This remark is not meant to belittle the value of Mr. Newman's paper.—I am, Sir, yours truly, Z.

Mr. Newman, in reply, says:

'I am aware that the melody of 'O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden,' like that of some other German chorales, is sung to more than one set of words. The only questions are, is it most generally associated with the Passion, and does it bear, in the 'Christmas Oratorio,' the interpretation that I and others have put upon it? I should say the fact that Bach uses it so many times in the 'Matthew Passion' is some evidence of its association with the death of Jesus both in Bach's mind and in that of his congregation. But be that as it may, 'Z' is wrong in his assumption that 'to the German mind it conveys no particular association,' and that it is only 'English audiences, which know the tune chiefly through the Passions,' that will find 'a mystic allusion in the "Christmas Oratorio."' Let me quote four German testimonies in refutation of this assumption.

Spitta ('Life of Bach,' ii., 579) says: 'The premonition of Christ's death, immediately after His birth, has assumed a very striking form in Part I. by the adaptation of the melody of "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden" to the words of greeting, "How shall I fitly meet Thee?" which falls across the bright festal tone like a dim shadow.'

Schweitzer ('J. S. Bach, le musicien-poète,' p. 281) says: 'Bach has the Advent chorale "Wie soll ich Dich empfangen" sung to a melody of the Passion, implying that Jesus has come into the world to suffer.'

Arnold Schering ('Bach's Textbehandlung,' p. 19) says: 'Bach is very fond of these retrospects upon past catastrophes or forecasts of impending ones—here again he is the deep-feeling and far-seeing musician, raising himself high above the poet. It is extraordinarily moving when, in the "Christmas Oratorio," the melody of "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden" strikes into the scene of joy with the words of "Wie soll ich Dich empfangen"—as if the congregation were doubtfully asking, "Shall we rejoice over the birth of the Saviour or mourn His shameful end?"'

In Philip Wolfrum's recent book on Bach (vol. ii., pp. 14, 15) there is a discussion of Bach's symbolism, in which he remarks that 'if the hearer does not know the melody that appears in the orchestra independently of the voice part, as well as the text with which it is usually associated in the church, he often fails to see the situation clearly . . .' Wolfrum gives one or two examples,—Bach's use, for example, of the melody of 'Aus tiefer Not schrei' ich zu dir' as a bass to the recitative 'Ach! dass mein Glaube noch so schwach.' When a hearer ignorant of the text listens to a thing of this kind, says Wolfrum, the sense of it escapes him. He adds: 'When, in the "Christmas Oratorio," Bach sets Gerhardt's hymn "Wie soll ich Dich empfangen" to the melody of "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden," that breathes of the Passion, . . . he establishes profoundly thoughtful relationships that are only apparent to people versed in the German hymns.'

These citations are enough, I think, to show that it is precisely the German mind that is most conscious of the symbolism at this point. They disprove 'Z's' assertions that 'to the German mind it conveys no particular association,' and that if Bach 'intended to establish such a connection of ideas' he 'must have failed in his endeavour.'

THE LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL ORGAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—We note with special interest the article in your last issue by Dr. Alcock on the Liverpool and Hamburg organs, and the correspondence between the Rev. J. H. Burns and Messrs. Willis, owing to the fact that we are the representatives in this country of Messrs. Walcker & Co. Without wishing to enter into the controversy as to the relative sizes of the organs, beyond saying that the Hamburg organ is actually in existence and the Liverpool one will not be so for four years—so for that period at least Messrs. Walcker & Co. can claim to be the builders of the largest organ in the world—we would say this: Without hearing the Hamburg organ and investigating the wonderful and ingenious mechanical devices which are applied, it is impossible to arrive at a fair judgment on the instrument. The writer had the privilege of going completely through the Hamburg organ a short time ago in company with Mr. Walcker, and afterwards of playing the instrument for a considerable time, and he can testify without bias that such an organ has never yet been constructed. With reference to the difference in the wind pressure of the Hamburg and Liverpool organs, we are sure that Messrs. Willis will agree that heavy wind pressure is not absolutely necessary for a fine organ. For instance, the beautiful Hill organ in St. Stephen's, Walbrook, a low-pressure organ throughout, may be quoted as an example. One of the chief mechanical novelties in the Hamburg organ consists of 828 combination pistons which are placed above the rocking stop tablets in groups of four to each tablet. With this, four different sets of combinations can be made on any group of stops, and brought into operation by a combination piston conveniently arranged under the various manuals. This system allows of new combinations being constantly formed even while the organist is playing, and is much less complicated, both from the mechanic's and organist's point of view, than the systems in vogue in this country. We have a number of illustrations and particulars of the Hamburg organ here, which we shall be very delighted to show to anyone interested.—Yours faithfully,

AN ORCHESTRAL WORK BY KARG-ELERT.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—It may be of interest to your readers to hear that an orchestral work by Sigfrid Karg-Elert (an instalment of an appreciative article on whom appears in your February number) received a first performance here (and, I believe, in this country) on February 10, by the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society.

The work is based on the Suite by Bizet, 'Jeux d'Enfants,' Karg-Elert having adopted the principal themes of the various movements and treated them orchestrally in a brilliant manner. Though he has retained the general title 'Suite,' he has not kept slavishly to the form of the originals, and has re-named all the movements, abandoning Bizet's programmatic titles and making 'Berceuse' into 'Intermezzo,' 'Galop' into 'Finale' and so on.

The orchestration exhibits very markedly the composer's feeling for colour, while the treatment of the melodies and the polyphonic writing throughout remind one very pleasantly of the organ works. Fine imitative passages and fugatos abound, and the part-writing in the slower movements is positively delicious.

The local Press passes over the work with apathy, and this must be an additional justification for my writing to you on the subject.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE M. COTTON.

BRITISH OPERA AND LIBRETTISTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I have read Mr. Herman Klein's rejoinder to Mr. Clutsum's admirable article in your January number. May I ask Mr. Klein upon what evidence he bases his supposition that we have no librettists? What fault has he to find with the dramatic writing of Stephen Phillips (a potential writer of opera texts), with Mr. Grogan (who did 'Pierrot and Pierrette' for Mr. Holbrooke), or with writers of choral poems set by leading composers? I have written a libretto, which if not a masterpiece of dramatic form compares favourably with those of Messrs. Illica and Giosca. Mr. Klein can have a copy from Mr. William Reeves (for nothing if he applies officially, for 2s. if in a private capacity). There are others, which should be known to any serious writer. I am engaged upon a modern dramatic subject at the present moment, and welcome any practical suggestion with any chance of production. As a man making his living by various forms of writing, and one who has obtained choral production, I resent the implication that British poets and librettists generally are to be condemned without trial. I (and no doubt others) desire to specialise in this direction, and to work in collaboration with composers who know their business, and who, with us, have a right to public trial before a jury of our peers. Mr. Klein is unkind and uncritical thus to ring the leper's bell and cry 'unclean!'

Yours faithfully,

REGINALD R. BUCKLEY.

Obituary.

The Rev. JOHN JULIAN, D.D., Canon of York Minster, who, as recorded in our issue for February, passed away at Thirsk on January 22, was known and respected, wherever the English Church holds sway, for his works on Hymnology. Of these the chief was the 'Dictionary of Hymnology,' which appeared in 1892. It stands alone as a guide to the study of English Hymnody, which it has helped to raise to its present dignity as a branch of æsthetic and historical learning. His other works include 'Concerning Hymns' (1874); 'Carols, Ancient and Modern' (1900); and a critical monograph on 'Nearer, my God, to Thee' (1911). Canon Julian was born on January 27, 1839.

We regret to announce also the following deaths:

Mr. E. B. SIMMS, a prominent figure in the musical life of North Wales, at the age of seventy-nine. From 1856 until his retirement in 1894 Mr. Simms was organist of Wrexham Parish Church. Subsequently he took up lighter work at Rhosrobin Church, where he remained as organist until a year ago.

Miss EVANGELINE ANTHONY, the only daughter of Mr. Charles Anthony, of Hereford, at the age of twenty-seven. Miss Anthony was a violinist of advanced powers, and had built up a considerable reputation in London.

CHARLES HENRY SHEARD, senior partner in the firm of Charles Sherry & Co., music publishers, Shaftesbury Avenue, London.

FOLK-SONG AND DANCE.

The preliminary prospectus of the Summer School of Folk-Song and Dance to be held at Stratford-upon-Avon from August 2 to August 30 has been issued, and gives information which can be more fully supplied by Miss Rainbow, Box Office, Stratford-upon-Avon. Mr. Cecil Sharp is the Director.

The first annual general meeting of the English Folk-Dance Society will be held on March 13, at 8.30 p.m., at the Polytechnic Institute, Manresa Road, Chelsea.

The first of a series of lectures on 'Sword, Morris, and Country-dances' was given by Mr. Cecil Sharp at Queen's Hall on February 13.

London Concerts.

MR. BALFOUR GARDINER'S CONCERT.

The first concert of this season's series was given on February 11 at Queen's Hall. The programme was a greatly varied one, comprising Parry's new 'Linked Symphony' (analysed in our last issue), a number of madrigals, part-songs, and old anthems, Dr. Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a theme by Tallis for string orchestra, a new 'Christmas Hymn' for choir and orchestra, 'Before the pining of the stars,' by B. J. Dale, 'Two Easter pieces' for female voices, by Von Holst, a Passacaglia for small orchestra, 'Green bushes,' by Percy Grainger, who also contributed a chorus, 'The Inuit' (first performance). It is impossible for us to give a critical account of this feast of music. Mr. Dale's hymn made a good impression owing to its fancifulness and effective expression of the words. Dr. Vaughan Williams's grave work seemed over-long for concert use, but it has many beautiful moments. The Oriana Madrigal Society furnished the choir, and the New Symphony Orchestra was an efficient exponent of all the instrumental sections. Mr. C. Kennedy Scott conducted most of the music, Sir Hubert Parry and Dr. Vaughan Williams each directing his own work.

ALEXANDRA PALACE CHORAL SOCIETY.

This Society pursues a generous policy in occasionally bringing forward new works by British composers. The programme of the concert given on February 1 consisted of the first production of a new sacred cantata, 'The Man of Sorrows,' composed by Dr. James Lyon. It was a bold idea to re-set a story which has been already allied to immortal music, but we imagine that Dr. Lyon had no intention to pit himself against Handel and Bach. What he has succeeded in doing is to produce a singable work which displays considerable melodic charm and attractive colour. The choruses are very well written for the voices. The last number shows the composer's constructive talent to great advantage. The cantata was very well performed under Mr. Allen Gill's direction. Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was also very effectively performed. The soloists were Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Maud Wright, Messrs. Herbert Brown, Alfred Heather, and Percy Heming.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The concert given on February 1 was made remarkable because it brought forward for the first time in this country Scriabine's 'Prometheus: the poem of fire.' Much had been heard beforehand of the extraordinary nature of this work, its novel tonal basis (a feature dealt with by Mr. Clutsum on p. 156), its daring originality, its attempt to realise in music cosmic evolution and the mysticism of theosophy.

The conception includes an association of colour, for the purpose of which Scriabine has invented a 'keyboard of light' which is not yet available. Besides a very full orchestra, there are ad libitum choral parts which were not used on this occasion, an important part for pianoforte, and an organ part.

The Symphony opens mysteriously with a Lento movement designed to suggest primordial chaos, and later sections develop the gradual emergence of order and the stimulus provided by the Promethean spark, 'which expands into the blossom of human intelligence and self-consciousness,' and leads to the awakening of the will to create. All this is unfolded in a stream of sound which may or may not be regarded by everyone as music—now turbid, now majestic and calm, and culminating in a terrific whirlpool of tone that outclasses '1812.' What to think of it all is bewildering. Is it a natural progressive evolution of art, or is it a freakish and sterile variation? For our part, we are content to record the general impression the work leaves of power, dim immensity, seriousness merging into ecstasy, and a consistency of idiom that made for form. The Symphony was magnificently performed under Sir Henry Wood, and Mr. Arthur Cooke battled ably with the pianoforte part.

In accordance with a desire voiced by the Editor of this journal, the Symphony was performed twice—a rare distinction in this country. The majority of the audience remained for the second performance, and applauded vigorously: perhaps more in recognition of Sir Henry's labours than in appreciation of the music. The other items of the programme were Haydn's Symphony No. 8 in B flat and Beethoven's Violin concerto, which was finely played by Herr Carl Flesch.

At the Symphony Concert of February 15, the outstanding feature was a magnificent interpretation of Tchaikovsky's first Pianoforte concerto by Mr. Frederic Lamond. Although chiefly noted as an exponent of Beethoven, Mr. Lamond showed that he could challenge comparison with any member of the fiery romantic school. The Symphony was an early example in G minor by Mozart. The programme further included Sinigaglia's 'Piemonte' Suite, the Love-scene from Strauss's 'Feuersnot', and opened with the Trauermarsch from 'Götterdämmerung', played in honour of Captain Scott.

THE BACH CHOIR.

The concert given by this choir at Queen's Hall on February 4, under the direction of Dr. H. P. Allen, bore a double importance. Such a choral performance as that of Bach's 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure,' given then by this choir, is a rare event in London, and the first London performance of Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'Sea Symphony,' produced at Leeds in 1910, was a long-delayed act of justice. In the music of Bach Dr. Allen naturally observed a reverent and appropriate treatment, and in this he was admirably supported by his choir. It was gratifying to note that these chorists possessed a technique that enabled them to sing the eleven numbers of the Motet—all unaccompanied—with freedom, precision, unflinching quality of tone, and accuracy of pitch. In the case of Dr. Vaughan Williams's work,—which is written on a Festival scale, is elaborate in detail, and employs all the resources of modern orchestration,—the heavy claims of rehearsal stood in the way of complete realisation. Nevertheless, the performance reached a high level. We were again impressed by the truth of its atmosphere, its freedom of idea, and the frequent tendency of the composer to rely for effect upon the scoring. The soloists of the concert were the Hon. Norah Dawney, Mr. Geoffrey Garrod, and Mr. Campbell McInnes in the Motet, Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. McInnes in the Symphony. Miss Nicholls was also heard in a Scene from Beethoven's 'Fidelio.'

LONDON CHORAL SOCIETY.

At the concert given by this Society at Queen's Hall on February 12, the entire programme was drawn from the works of Beethoven. It was gratifying to note that the audience was an exceptionally large one. First came Beethoven's Mass in C, a beautiful work which it is a matter for surprise is not more frequently heard. Its obvious appeal of charm of melody, rhythm and colour, to say nothing of its expressiveness, would seem to mark it out for popular appreciation, which nowadays is so often surfeited with music of a more 'advanced' character. The work was smoothly and often very expressively performed by the choir, and the soloists were Miss Isobel Stuckey, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Hughes Macklin, and Mr. Dawson Freer.

The next item was the rarely-given 'Choral Fantasia' (really Fantasia for pianoforte, choir, and orchestra), in which the solo was admirably played by Miss Fanny Davies. Finally, the great 'Choral Symphony' was performed, the soloists being Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Hughes Macklin, and Mr. Robert Radford.

The performance was in every respect a highly-creditable one, and Mr. Arthur Fagge, here as elsewhere, exhibited his decision and alertness as conductor.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

For the Ash Wednesday Concert (February 5) the Royal Choral Society this year chose Gounod's 'The Redemption,' which has not been performed under these auspices for seven years. The audience did not overcrowd the Albert Hall, but it was large enough to show that the oratorio still retains a powerful hold upon the public mind. The work was sonorously interpreted by the choir, under Sir Frederick Bridge's direction, and the attractions of the evening were increased by the solo-singing of Miss Ruth Vincent, Miss Emily Shepherd, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Morgan Kingston, Mr. Campbell McInnes, and Mr. Montague Borwell. Mr. H. L. Balfour was at the organ.

THE ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

On January 30, the concert given by this Society at Queen's Hall was conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald, and Busoni was the magnet as soloist. A 'Fantasie Contrapunctistica' for full orchestra, founded on Bach, written by Busoni, was to have been given under his baton for the first time in England, but owing to difficulties at rehearsals the piece was withdrawn and in its place the Prelude and Liebestod from Wagner's 'Tristan' was played. Dvorák's 'Carneval' Overture was a brilliant opening to the programme, and Busoni gave a remarkable performance of Liszt's Concerto in E flat. A new orchestral piece, comprising an Introduction, Mazurka, and Finale (Op. 43), composed by Mr. Norman O'Neill, whose music has recently brought him into the limelight, was one of the most interesting items. Mr. O'Neill has a leaning to light, dainty, ethereal orchestration of the Debussy order, combined with definite melody. The amours of a Faun and a Princess form a basis for expression. The work was excellently played under Mr. O'Neill's direction, and made a very favourable impression. Tchaikovsky's Variations from the Suite in G, and Strauss's 'Don Juan,' were the other items. In both these pieces Mr. Ronald showed his virtuosity as a conductor.

Herr Willem Mengelberg was the conductor on February 18, and the programme well displayed his gift for securing orchestral expression. Glazounov's first Symphony, which opened the concert, is an unfamiliar example of the composer's facility and lyrical invention, further distinguished by its Western purity of musical texture. It was followed by Saint-Saëns's Violin concerto in B minor, which Miss Kathleen Parlow played with decision, good rhythmic sense, and a keen, bright tone. The remainder of the programme was given up to Wagner excerpts.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It is rarely that two symphonies are included in a modern concert programme, but the absence of the customary soloist in the case of the concert on January 27, made this possible. The two chosen were Beethoven's eighth and Brahms's second, and under Herr Fritz Steinbach's direction they were given with all the dignity and vitality characteristic of the conductor, and the purity of tone characteristic of the orchestra. Bach's third 'Brandenburg' Concerto and Brahms's 'St. Antonii' Variations were also performed.

On February 10 the concert was conducted with considerable ability by Mr. Hamilton Hart. It is a wise and generous policy thus to allow native budding conductors a chance. A feature was the first performance of Mr. Hart's Variations for solo violin and orchestra. The air chosen is 'The young girl milking her cow.' This is so very freely treated that some of the sections of the piece can hardly be called variations. But the music was not less welcome, for it always had some grace and ingenuity to recommend it. The violin part was admirably played by Paul Kochanski. Another item of the programme was an Overture, 'Boadicea,' by Montague F. Phillips, who conducted. The development of this often very effective work is lengthy, and tempts one to make the cheap suggestion that it would gain in interest by a process of elimination. The timpani seemed rather too much in evidence, as perhaps they are only too often in modern music. Some brilliant episodes for the strings were features, and the whole construction of the work revealed the well-trained musician. The other pieces performed were 'Don Juan' (Strauss), which was finely played, and Bach's Overture in D, No. 3.

For February 17 an extra concert outside the ordinary subscription series was given, under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. The programme included Weber's 'Oberon' Overture, Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto No. 2, in F, and the Overture 'Francesca da Rimini,' by Tchaikovsky. But brilliantly as these works were played, the audience was drawn chiefly to hear a new Symphony in D minor, 'Thalassa,' and Symphonic Variations for pianoforte and orchestra entitled 'Normandy,' both by Arthur Somervell. The Symphony is probably the most important musical work so far brought forward by this composer. It represents the maturity of his style. Each movement is headed with a motto suggested by some aspect of the sea, but the composer states that his work is not programme music in the sense that it illustrates a definite series of events. The first and second movements made a distinctly favourable impression, and the much elaborated last movement contains much to commend. The general character of the music of the whole Symphony is not very modern, and may be described as 'Victorian' without the use of that word implying weakness. Dr. Somervell's idiom is easily followed, and there is nearly always the saving grace of clear melody to interest the listener. It cannot be said to show conspicuous strength or originality, but it constantly satisfied by its ease of technique and fluency. The work was splendidly played under Nikisch, who had evidently bestowed great care on its rehearsal. The Variations are based upon a folk-tune heard by the composer in Normandy. This tune did not strike us as a particularly good one, but the composer contrives to invest it with much interest by ingenuity and beauty of treatment. The pianoforte part is, of course, the great feature, and it was well-played by Mr. Donald Tovey, although sometimes his manner of playing suggests hesitation. The audience was very generous in its appreciation of the composer.

THE NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Miss Phyllis Neilson-Terry's career on the stage opened—and has been sustained—with such brilliance, that her musical powers are little known to the public. Her first important appearance as a vocalist, made at Queen's Hall on February 6, at a concert of the New Symphony Orchestra, revealed her as the possessor of a high soprano voice exceptionally well adapted to coloratura singing. In Félicien David's 'Couplets du Mysoli' she proceeded higher, and with greater flexibility, than many prime donne who essay this and kindred songs. The same concert brought to a first hearing in London Herr Felix Weingartner's 'Lustige' Overture, a work distinguished by a self-conscious kind of humour and not by fertility of idea. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennel's dance,' Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and some Debussy pieces, provided the interesting features of the orchestral programme. The orchestra played under Mr. Landon Ronald's direction with enthusiasm and finely-directed skill.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS.

The performance of Saint-Saëns's G minor Pianoforte concerto, with Herr Benno Moiseiwitsch as pianist, was the chief feature of the concert given by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall on January 29. The instrumentalists played, under Mr. Arthur Payne's direction, with their customary enthusiasm and proficiency throughout an exacting programme.

On February 19 the Strolling Players gave a concert at Queen's Hall, under Mr. Joseph Ivimey's direction. The Symphony was Schubert's 'Unfinished,' and the soloists were Mr. W. H. Squire (violinello), and Madame Louise Rieger, who made a successful début as a vocalist.

The concert of the Stock Exchange Choral Society, at Queen's Hall, on February 14, was as usual highly entertaining in the best sense. Under Mr. Hamish MacCunn's direction, the orchestra played Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony and Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' and the choir, under its new conductor, Mr. George Kitchen, gave an excellent account of glees, a madrigal, and part-songs.

Haydn's first 'Salomon' Symphony, Lalo's F minor Violin concerto, and Brahms's fourth Symphony were played by the Westminster Orchestral Society at the Royal Academy of Music on February 14, under the direction of Mr. Lennox Clayton. Miss Dorothy Bridson was the solo violinist. The orchestral execution was everything that is expected nowadays from amateur bodies in London; this is saying much.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.

The Twelve o'Clock Concerts have continued their regular course on Thursdays at Æolian Hall; on January 30 Miss Rosa Ehrlich played the 'Kreutzer' Sonata; on February 6 distinctive features were the performance of César Franck's A minor, by Mr. Norman Salmond, and that of Mrs. Alice Verne-Bredt's prize Phantasy Trio by Miss Ivy Angove, Mr. Salmond, and Miss Mathilde Verne.

The Société des Concerts Français has been giving attention recently to old French music. At the new English Art Club, Suffolk Street, on January 31, they gave a programme selected from the works of Lully, Couperin, Rameau, Campra, Montéclair, Mondoville, Dandrieu, Daquin, Royer, and Duphy. Miss Annie Balgucerie was the vocalist, and M. Joachim Nin played the harpsichord. On February 14, at Bechstein Hall, the first part of the programme was chosen from Milandre, Leclair, and J.-Ph. Rameau. The remainder illustrated 15th-century songs, and the work of the modern composers, MM. Florent Schmitt, Guy Ropartz, Henri Duparc, and E. Chausson. The music was all intensely interesting, and it was admirably interpreted by Mr. Theodore Byard (vocalist) and M. Macon. M. Guillaume, M. et Madame Feuillard. Mr. G. O'Connor Morris proved an accompanist of exceptional ability.

Mr. Josef Holbrooke inaugurated the thirteenth series of his chamber concerts at Æolian Hall, on January 31, with characteristic examples of his styles as a humorist and as a composer. We prefer him in the latter capacity, in which he displays more ease. His Quintet for clarinet and strings, Op. 37, played by Mr. Draper, with Messrs. John Saunders, Charles Woodhouse, Ernest Yonge, and Charles Crabbe, was a work that had some moments of power and high inventiveness, and never failed to interest the ear. An 'encore' was given to Mr. Holbrooke's song, 'Come not when I am dead.' It was sung by Miss Jean Waterston, who also introduced some new songs by Mr. C. Kenned Scott, Mr. Rutland Boughton, and Mr. Norman O'Neill. A one-movement String quartet by Mr. Joseph Speaight, entitled, 'Ariel,' was a cleverly-wrought piece of music, with some truth in its descriptiveness. Vincent d'Indy's Clarinet trio, and Pianoforte solos given by Miss Rita Neve, completed the programme.

The Rosé Quartet, who are unsurpassed in the more delicate demands of chamber-music, played Mozart's C major Quartet (K. 465), Beethoven's Quartet in C, Op. 59, No. 3, and, with Mrs. Carl Derenburg, Brahms's G minor Pianoforte quartet at Bechstein Hall on February 3. At a second concert, on February 7, their programme consisted of Schubert's Quartet in A minor, Beethoven's in E flat, Op. 74, and Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet in A, the pianist being Mr. Richard Epstein.

The London Trio (M. Louis Peesckai, Mr. Whitehouse, and Madame Amina Goodwin) gave an interesting concert at Æolian Hall on February 3. Schumann's Trio in G minor, Op. 110, and that of Hurlstone were the principal features, and both were admirably interpreted. Madame Elsa Oswald (vocalist) and Madame Goodwin gave solos.

M. Gabriel Fauré's Pianoforte quartet in C minor (Op. 15) again appeared as a singularly attractive work when played by Mr. York Bowen and members of the Wessely Quartet at Bechstein Hall on February 16. The complete quartet of players were heard in Beethoven's great work in C major, Op. 59, No. 3, and, assisted by Mr. James Lockyer, in Dvorák's 'Nigger' Quintet.

The chamber concert given by students of the Royal College of Music on January 28 provided creditable performances of Beethoven's String quartet in A minor and Mozart's Clarinet quintet in A major. At the Royal Academy of Music on February 17 a chamber-music programme included Mendelssohn's Octet and Arensky's Pianoforte trio in D minor.

Five organ students at the Royal Academy of Music—Messrs. Alec Rowley, H. S. Middleton, J. A. Sowerbutts, H. G. Perry, and W. H. P. Hoare—provided the chief interest at a concert on January 28, given in the new hall at the Academy.

RECITALS.

Three further appearances of Mr. Daniel Melsa have to be recorded: on January 23 and February 1, he gave recitals at Steinway Hall; and on February 8 he was heard at the Royal Academy of Music in the Concertos of Mendelssohn and Brahms, the accompaniment being supplied by the New Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald. Thrown thus into proper perspective his playing gained much in effectiveness, and its maturity of feeling could be appreciated as well as its purity. At this last recital Madame Sophie Barrand, a singer endowed with a voice of strikingly beautiful quality, made a successful first appearance. A fifth recital was given at the same Hall on February 15 in conjunction with a New Zealand Contralto, Miss Mina Caldwell.

Three notable pianoforte recitals, in which the work of great artists made its familiar appeal, were those of Mr. Harold Bauer at Bechstein Hall on January 25, Mr. Mark Hambourg at Queen's Hall on January 29, and Signor Busoni at Bechstein Hall on February 6. M. Albert Geloso, leader of the Geloso Quartet, showed a strong individuality as a violinist at Bechstein Hall on January 24.

Miss Isolde Menges, once a prodigy, now a violinist, gave finely expressive and technically good performances of Concertos at Queen's Hall on February 4 accompanied by the Brighton Municipal Orchestra under Mr. Lyell-Taylor. A second recital was given, with the same assistance, on February 18, when the Beethoven Concerto, admirably played, was the chief number.

In Æolian Hall, on February 6, Miss Clara Butterworth gave a recital of songs by her husband, Mr. Montague Phillips, which concentrated attention upon their deftness and geniality, and upon the attractive quality of the singer's voice. A String quartet by Mr. Phillips was played by the Walenn Quartet.

Madame Lula Mysz-Gmeiner, who belongs to the front rank of Lieder singers, gave a recital before a crowded house at Bechstein Hall on February 11.

An evening of exceptional interest and instruction was provided by Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser at Æolian Hall on February 12, with a programme of Hebridean folk-music. Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser gave abundant information about the songs, and was ably assisted by her sisters, Miss Margaret Kennedy and Mrs. Tobias Matthey, and by Mr. Percy Heming.

Miss Mary Dickinson showed exceptional powers as a violinist at Queen's Hall on February 13, when she gave a concert with the assistance of the National Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Hamilton Harty. Beethoven's Concerto was powerfully interpreted.

On the same evening, Miss Carmen Hill gave a recital at Æolian Hall, and further established her claims as a Lieder singer of high rank.

Mr. Busoni's superb powers as a virtuoso were shown in a Liszt programme at Bechstein Hall on February 19.

Recitals have also been given by Miss Annabel McDonald (vocalist), Miss Katherine Goodson (pianist), Miss Sara Susmann (vocalist), Madame Thekla Bruckwilder (vocalist), Miss Ella Ulrich (pianist), the Misses Ward-Meyer (pianist and violinist), Miss Adela Hamaton (pianist), Miss Ibolya Gyrfas (violinist, aged thirteen), Mr. James Friskin (pianist), Miss Muriel von Raatz (vocalist), Mr. Wilhelm Backhaus (pianist), Miss Meta Ling and Mr. Handley-Davies (vocalist and violinist), Miss Eileen Boyd and Mr. Carl Budden-Morris (vocalist and pianist), Miss Dorothy Gandy and Mr. Reginald Yates (vocalists), Miss Ellen Edwards and Miss Margaret Layton (pianist and vocalist), Miss Ethel Maas (vocalist), Mr. George Henschel (vocalist), Miss F. Copeland (vocalist), Mr. J. Campbell McInnes (vocalist).

Beethoven's eighth Symphony, Mozart's Pianoforte concerto in D, with Mr. A. R. Warburton as soloist, and a Wieniawski Violin concerto, with Miss Ruth Howell as soloist, were provided for the delectation of young people attending Miss Kimpton's orchestral concert at Æolian Hall on January 25.

A Violin concerto by Herr Weingartner, that provoked respect rather than liking, was played by Herr Kreisler at the Palladium on Sunday, January 26, accompanied by the Beecham Symphony Orchestra under Herr Schilling-Ziensen.

A 'Liza Lehmann' concert, with the composer at the pianoforte, was given with great success at Bechstein Hall on January 30, commencing at 4.45. A unique feature was provided by Miss Nancy Price (Mrs. Charles Maude). Her daughter Joan, aged four, has conceived a fairyland of her own, inhabited by all sorts of queer animals with laughable habits. These were described by Miss Price, in recitation form, more or less in her daughter's own wording, while Madame Lehmann supplied incidental music. It was extremely diverting and far from infantile. The artists assisting in the remainder of the programme were Miss Kathleen Peck, Miss Alys Gear, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, Mr. David Greville, and Mr. Peter Dawson.

A revised version of Mr. Edward German's excellent 'March Rhapsody' was performed with popular success at the Albert Hall on February 2, under the composer's direction. The players were the New Symphony Orchestra, who carried out the rest of an interesting programme under Mr. Landon Ronald's direction.

Miss Ethel Barnes (violinist) and Mr. Charles Phillips (vocalist), assisted by Mr. Percy Waller (pianist), performed a familiar programme of familiar music with their customary ability at Bechstein Hall, on February 8.

The Royal Artillery Band gave abundant pleasure to a large audience at Queen's Hall on February 14, in a programme of which Schumann's first Symphony was the principal number. Mr. E. C. Stretton conducted.

Suburban Concerts.

The second concert of the season of the Harringay Choral and Orchestral Society was given in the new Allison Hall, Harringay, on January 25, when 'A tale of Old Japan' occupied the chief place in the programme. The performers, numbering about 140, gave a very creditable interpretation of the work. The artists, Madame Sarah Dawson, Mrs. E. Kent Parsons, Mr. Stanley Ridout, and Mr. Dawson Freer, all ably acquitted themselves in the solo parts. During the miscellaneous part of the programme the orchestra performed Coleridge-Taylor's Suite to 'Othello.' Mr. Harry E. King conducted throughout, and was warmly congratulated on his handling of both choir and orchestra.

The Band of the Portsmouth Division of the Royal Marines, conducted by Lieut. George Miller, gave concerts at the Alexandra Palace on Saturday, January 25, afternoon and evening, and on Sunday evening, January 26, which proved a great popular success. Over 4,000 people attended on the Sunday evening, although the usual prices of admission were doubled.

That the South London Musical Club is a force to be reckoned with is evidenced by the quality of the choral singing displayed at the 213th smoking concert given at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Tuesday, February 4, when the newly elected president, Mr. Frederick Henry, took the chair for the first time. The male-voice choir, numbering 70 or 80, which forms the raison d'être of the club, under the direction of Mr. H. L. Balfour gave highly intelligent interpretations of Elgar's five part-songs (Op. 45) from the Greek Anthology, and also of Granville Bantock's variations on the 'Piper of Dundee.' The programme further included more or less well-known choral works by Mendelssohn, C. S. Evans, Cornelius, Horsley, and Gounod. The annual dinner will be held at the Holborn Restaurant on Saturday, April 19, when Mr. William Johnson Galloway has consented to take the chair.

A very successful violin recital was given by Miss Evelin Rudkin at St. Peter's Hall, Brockley, on February 6. She was assisted by Mr. Charles Norman (vocalist), and Mr. Walter Rowley (pianist).

The Bessborough Social Association Choral Society, conducted by Mr. William Holmes, gave a concert at the Vaughan Road Schools, Harrow, on February 8, and gave creditable performances of Fanning's 'Song of the Vikings,' Sullivan's 'The long day closes,' and choral fantasia on Wallace's 'Maritana,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Viking-song.' A number of vocal and instrumental solos constituted the remainder of the programme.

Verdi's 'Requiem' was performed by the Crystal Palace Orchestral and Choral Society on February 15, and under Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock's direction a significant interpretation was given. The choir sang with unity, vivacity of attack and bright tone, and the orchestra was reliable. Solo parts were taken by Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Winifred Williamson, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Julien Henry.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

Among the concerts given in the latter end of January mention should be made of a vocal recital by Miss Elma Baker, a local soprano who from time to time has studied in Italy, France, and Germany. Her recital was given before a large audience at the Queen's College on January 20, eliciting considerable appreciation, and one was conscious that her voice had considerably gained in volume and is now subject to complete control. Her selection covered a wide range of vocal art, from Arne to Rachmaninoff. She had for her coadjutors Mr. Harry B. Carter, violoncellist, and Mr. G. H. Manton, accompanist.

The Catterall String Quartet gave their fourth Chamber Concert at Queen's College on January 21, the programme submitted including Haydn's String quartet in D, Brahms's Sonata for viola and pianoforte in E flat, Op. 120, and Debussy's String quartet in G minor, Op. 10. The performance was on a high standard of excellence throughout, revealing perfect unanimity and an admirable ensemble. Mr. David Regell, a member of the Quartet, was the viola player in Brahms's Sonata, and the pianist Mr. Clarence Raybould, their artistic efforts being crowned by a noble and penetrating performance.

The third Harrison Concert was given in the Town Hall, which was crowded to overflowing, on January 27, the chief attraction being the appearance of Herr Fritz Kreisler and Herr Wilhelm Backhaus, and with two such great artists the interpretation of Grieg's Sonata for violin and pianoforte in C minor, Op. 45, was high perfect. The vocalists were Madame Donalda and Madame Ada Crossley.

On January 29, the Birmingham Philharmonic Society gave their third orchestral concert of the season in the Town Hall, under Mr. Wassili Safonoff's able conductorship, the programme including Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, Vivaldi's String concerto, the Introduction to Act 3 of Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger,' Glazounov's Symphonie-picturale 'The Spring,' and Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'Easter overture.' One cannot recall a finer and more poignant performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony than M. Safonoff gave, although in many ways his tempi were almost aggressively slow.

The Birmingham Choral Union's Concert, held in the Town Hall on January 25, was entirely devoted to Mozart, the principal choral work chosen being the twelfth Mass, which has not been heard here for a great many years. There is much in the work that is thin and weak and unlike Mozart—indeed it has often been assumed that the music was not written by Mozart at all—but, on the other hand, there are certain passages and phrases that no one else could have written. Mr. Richard Wassell conducted a quite acceptable performance, and since his appointment as chorus-master and conductor of the Society, on the retirement of Mr. Thomas Facer, he has shown himself to be an earnest and painstaking master. The soli quartet were Miss Alice Hare, Miss May Peters, Mr. Sydney Hooper, and Mr. Humphrey Bishop, the latter, an excellent London bass, achieving the greatest success.

A concert was given in the Town Hall on February 1 by prize-winners in connection with the Midland Musical Competition Festival held in May last year, the object of the concert being to raise funds for the next competition, to be held here towards the end of May. The attendance, however, was poor, and the funds are not likely to have been much benefited by this concert. The choral organizations which took part were the Coventry Co-operative Choir (winners of the Curwen Challenge Shield), the Birmingham Select Choir and Madrigal Society (winners of the Novello Challenge Shield), and the Stourbridge Institute Male-Voice Choir (winners of the Breitkopf & Härtel Challenge Shield). Solos on the pianoforte, violin, and violoncello were also given by prize-winners. The singing on the whole was quite good, and aroused the enthusiasm of those present.

In aid of the Leamington Home for Incurables an orchestral concert was given in the Edgbaston Assembly Rooms on February 4, organized and conducted by Mr. G. T. Summerton, of Leamington. The rank and file consisted of amateurs and professionals, who gave a popular programme, including Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony.' Considering that the rehearsals were restricted in number, the performance was by far better than one expected. The vocalist was Miss Chatterley Ingram. During the interval the Rev. H. W. H. Green (chairman of the institution) gave a short address, pointing out the great and useful work done by this special charity and strongly appealing for more support.

The third Max Mossel Drawing-room Concert of the season was held in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on February 6, and was entirely devoted to chamber-music interpreted by the famous Vienna Rosé Quartet, with the assistance of Miss Florence Smith, pianist. Ideal and flawless performances were given of Beethoven's String quartet in D, Op. 18, No. 3; the 'Romanze' from Grieg's String quartet, Op. 27; the 'Canzonetta' from Mendelssohn's String quartet in E flat, Op. 12; and Brahms's great String quartet in C minor, Op. 51, No. 1.

The Midland Musical Society gave a vivid performance of Dvorák's 'The spectre's bride' (originally produced at our Musical Festival of 1885), at the Town Hall, on February 8, the principal parts being well given by Miss Mary Lund, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Herbert Parker. Under Mr. A. J. Cotton's excellent conductorship, the choral forces realised a telling ensemble, enhanced by artistic gradation of light and shade, and admirable phrasing. The orchestra, so great a factor in this work, met all requirements, and the solo vocalists instilled a good deal of the dramatic element into their work. The second part of the programme was devoted to a Wagnerian selection.

Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion was given at the Birmingham Cathedral, under Mr. Edwin Stephenson's direction, Part 1 on February 21 and Part 2 the following afternoon. The solos were undertaken by Miss Viola Salvin, Miss Sara Silvers, and the Cathedral lay-clerks. The orchestra was led by Mr. Hytch, and Mr. Reynolds gave the 'Continuo' on a harpsichord. Dr. T. Appleby Matthews presided at the organ. A similar performance of the same work was given in the Cathedral last year.

An excellent popular orchestral concert was given in the Town Hall on February 15 by the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Julian Clifford, who is a great favourite here. The programme was well chosen, consisting mostly of 'popular' items calculated to please the masses. Mr. Wilfred Ridgway gave a brilliant performance of Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, admirably accompanied by the orchestra; and Mr. Mannito Klitgaard, a young Danish baritone, supplied the vocal items.

BOURNEMOUTH.

We have now entered upon the second half of the Winter season, the prospects for which are fully as favourable as those that were entertained at the beginning of the season, and that have now culminated in so many exploits of splendid achievement. Besides the serial concerts, a large number of well-known performers are booked to appear at special orchestral concerts or within the limits of the more intimate though by no means less enjoyable recital. In two particulars only are there appreciable lacunæ, and these do not testify too well of Bournemouth's vaunted erudition: pianists and violinists of note are as plentiful as pebbles on the seashore, but of exponents of chamber-music and of singers of artistic lieder (with one important exception) there is no mention. It is of course a matter of common knowledge that the subtleties of chamber-music are a caviare to those who have not acquired the taste, and this especial form of art has been tried again and again here with disastrous results, until now it is merely an occasional appendage to an orchestral concert. But that our leading singers of high-class art-songs should eschew Bournemouth is a sign that there is 'something rotten in the state' of musical appreciation here which should be exorcised forthwith if the town is not to lose caste as a musical centre. It is comforting to know that the ubiquitous ballad is not meeting with the same sturdy but misplaced enthusiasm here as once it did; surely, then, it is time that some effort should be made to direct audiences to what is worthy and lasting.

Turning to past events, we have to record the continued prosperity of the Symphony and Popular Concerts. At the former the principal features have been performances of R. Gliere's Symphony in E flat, Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony, and that of Haydn in B flat (No. 12). One upon whom we can always depend for an annual visit, Mr. Edward German, came on January 23 to conduct a selection from his compositions, of which the 'Coronation March and Hymn' and the 'March Rhapsody' were the most acceptable numbers. The soloists have included Mrs. Farnell-Watson, who shares with Mr. Hamilton Law the directorship of the Bournemouth School of Music, her playing of York Bowen's Pianoforte concerto in D minor being of great excellence; and Mr. Lloyd Powell and Miss May Mukle have also appeared. At the concert directed by Mr. Edward German a 'cello solo entitled 'Souvenir' and a violin solo entitled 'Nocturne' (both by Mr. German) were very acceptably played by Mr. F. Dunworth and Mr. F. King-Hall respectively, members of the orchestra.

The popularity of the Monday 'Pops' is now as pronounced as that of the older series, and there is no doubt that the programmes are unusually attractive. At the fifteenth concert a Tchaikovsky programme was presented, its principal feature being the 'Francesca di Rimini' tone-poem. On the following Monday a Massenet programme was given. On February 3 a Wagner concert was given, the scheme consisting of excerpts entirely drawn from 'The Ring.' A representative and interesting International concert was given on February 10. The concert on January 27 introduced a new vocal scena, 'The Jackdaw of Rheims,' by P. H. Williams, the music proving bright, but rather conventional. Chamber-music was given by Mrs. Farnell-Watson and Messrs. Holland, Speelman (members of the orchestra), and Coelho (professor of the violoncello at the Bournemouth School of Music).

Miscellaneous concerts have been given by Mr. Watkin Mills and party; Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. Julian Clifford, assisted by the Municipal Orchestra; Madame Ada Crossley (orchestral concert); and Miss Adela Verne, whose orchestral concert was one of the events of the season. A return visit from the Imperial Russian Ballet in Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Scheherazade' was a welcome spectacle that won much appreciation. Two of a series of University Extension Lectures by Dr. Markham Lee, on 'Makers of modern music,' have already been given; the first had for its subject, 'A brief history of the orchestra,' and the second treated of 'Wagner, the reformer of opera.'

Finally, on January 28, we had a most successful concert by the combined Municipal Choir and Orchestra, who must be very cordially commended for their excellent display in 'A tale of Old Japan' (S. Coleridge-Taylor), and 'The wedding of Shon Maclean' (Hubert Bath). The capital performances which both works received were a testimony to the ability of Mr. Godfrey. The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Maurice d'Oisly, and Mr. Julien Henry, an extremely efficient quartet.

We congratulate the firm of Ed. Bote & G. Bock, music publishers, of Berlin, on completing the seventy-fifth year of its existence. The house was founded on January 27, 1838.

BRISTOL.

On January 22, at the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, there was a concert of local folk-songs collected by Mr. F. H. Fortey, and arranged by Bristol musicians. The Holy Cross Choral Society sang effectively, and the soloists were Mrs. Louis Morley, Miss Maud Battagel, Mr. Reginald Rhymes, Mr. O. H. Illingworth, and the Rev. C. W. Davey. The choral features of the programme were conducted by Mr. A. S. Warrall, Mr. Walter P. Price, and Mr. Edward Cook. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Frank Taylor, Mr. Louis Morley, and Mr. Leo Lord.

The annual concert of the Clifton Choral Society was held at Redland Park Hall on January 23, when Flotow's 'Martha' was performed to the gratification of a large audience. The soloists were Miss Winifred Thomas, Miss Gladys M. Dyer, Mr. Lionel Venn, Mr. Lionel E. Doré, Mr. James Barker, and Mr. A. E. Stanley Hill. The leader of the orchestra was Mr. Harold Bernard; Miss Hettie Applegate was at the pianoforte; Mr. A. Ernest Hill conducted.

On January 30, the ladies' night of the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society took place, and Colston Hall was well filled. The special soloists were Mr. Donald Reid (alto, from St. Paul's Cathedral), and Mr. Charles Knowles. Sir George Martin conducted his two pieces, 'Hymn to Cupid' and 'Let maids be false, so wine be true,' and they were so much appreciated that the St. Paul's organist was eagerly recalled. Dr. A. H. Brewer directed the performance of his effective production 'A ballad when at sea,' which was one of the particular successes of the concert. In the programme were three novelties out of pieces forwarded by Mr. Douglas Muir, secretary of the Arion Male-Voice Club, whose head-quarters are at Victoria, British Columbia. From those sent the Bristol Society selected the following: 'In the moonlight' (Johannes Pache), 'The clover blossoms kiss her feet' (C. B. Hawley), and 'Serenade' (folk-song from Baden, arranged by Philipp Wolfrum). These pretty examples were nicely sung and much applauded. Some of the standard glees included in the concert scheme were finely interpreted, Mr. George Riseley, the talented conductor, exerting himself to good purpose in the direction of the choir.

West Bristol Choral Society on February 1 gave a concert at the Victoria Rooms, 'Acis and Galatea' (Handel), 'Loreley' (Mendelssohn), and a miscellaneous selection being effectively sung under the direction of Mr. C. Read. The solo vocalists were Miss Joan Dalrymple, Mr. H. Sanderson, and Mr. H. V. Spiller, and Mr. J. W. Duys led the orchestra.

Mr. Hubert Hunt's seventh chamber concert was held on February 3, at the Victoria Rooms, and gave pleasure to many persons. The compositions consisted of the Quartet in B flat major, Op. 67 (Brahms), Concerto in D minor (Bach), and Octet in E flat major, Op. 20 (Mendelssohn). The examples were effectively played, those who took part in the Octet being Mr. Hubert Hunt, Mrs. Fitzherbert, Miss K. Tudor Pole, Miss Avicé N. Sealy, Miss Gladys Home, Miss Hilda Barr, Mr. Roger Bucknall, and Miss Rosa Button.

The annual concert organized in aid of Bristol Post Office employees was held at the Victoria Rooms on February 7, and there was a packed audience. The principal singers were Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Hazel Gray, Mr. Reginald Rhymes, and Mr. Percy Heming. Mr. Percival Hodgson played violin solos, and Miss Kitty Newton was at the pianoforte.

A concert was given at the Victoria Rooms on February 8 in order to take farewell of Mr. Montague Worlock, a prominent Bristol vocalist who is about to quit England for America. Some of the principal vocalists and instrumentalists of the city took part in the concert, among them Miss Edith Evans, Miss Gladys Carling, Mr. Sidney Bennett, Mr. Maurice Alexander (violin), Mr. Herbert Parsons (pianoforte), Mr. C. W. Stear (organ), and Mr. W. E. Fowler (accompanist). Mr. Worlock, who possesses a fine bass voice, sang some of his favourite pieces, and there was great enthusiasm manifested by the audience.

On February 12 Bristol Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of their sixth season at the Victoria Rooms, under the direction of Mr. Maurice Alexander. Mr. F. S. Gardner was leader. The chief compositions performed were Liszt's Concerto in E flat, with Mr. Herbert Parsons at the pianoforte, and Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, both of which were admirably interpreted. The orchestra also performed the Prelude to 'Hansel and Gretel' (Humperdinck), the Prelude to Act 3 of 'Tristan und Isolde' (Wagner), and the ballet music from 'Le Cid' (Massenet).

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

'The Creation' was sung by the choir (augmented) of Princes Street, Devonport, Congregational Church, on January 19, with a small orchestra, Mr. E. J. Jane conducting. On the same date the Stonehouse Congregational Choir gave Gaul's 'Ruth,' conducted by Mr. F. W. Chorley. At the annual meeting of the Three Towns Choral Union on January 21, high appreciation was expressed of the work achieved by the hon. conductor, Mr. Manley Martin, through whose conscientious and artistic training the Festivals of 1912 had reached perhaps the highest standard of the series. The Union was reported to be in a very satisfactory position, numerically and financially. The diocesan service book was adopted for 1913, this being the year in which the deanery would be invited to participate in the Cathedral Festival. Three years ago the singing members of the Roman Catholic congregations were constituted as a Philharmonic Society, under the active presidency of the Rev. S. G. McGuckin and the conductorship of Mr. Albert Doyle. Each year a public performance has been given of a Mass or sacred cantata, and encouraged by success achieved, the committee this year selected Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle' and Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion' for principal study, and these were performed at a concert on January 21. The first work was perhaps too ambitious a choice, for the singers appeared nervous; and though the refinement of their tone and execution was a pleasing feature, their capabilities were not altogether adequate. The Mendelssohn piece was much more successful. A small band assisted. The Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir, conducted by Mr. D. Parkes, sang at the Corporation weekly concerts on February 8. The chief number was the conductor's setting of 'The elected Knight,' which on this its second performance in Plymouth, deepened the impression its high qualities had already made. 'Fallen heroes' (with tenor solo) and 'The singer's tomb' were other noteworthy pieces admirably sung by this cultured choir, who only need more intelligibility of enunciation to give entire satisfaction.

A visit to Plymouth on January 30 of Madame Melba and party, through Messrs. Moon & Sons, was memorable for the enthusiasm it aroused and the valuable lesson afforded by the artistry of the prima donna.

Mr. J. W. Newton has given two symphony concerts at Stonehouse during the month, thus closing another season. On January 21, the 'Unfinished' (Schubert) Symphony was played, and interest was attracted by a first performance at these concerts of Sterndale Bennett's Overture, 'Die Najaden.' The programme of the final concert on February 3 was compiled by plebiscite. The Schubert Symphony was demanded, and also Saint-Saëns's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, of which Mr. C. G. Pike played artistically the solo part. The string band of the Royal Garrison Artillery, conducted by Mr. R. G. Evans, played at the Corporation Concert on January 25. A well-selected programme was appreciated, and with the band Mr. H. Moreton, borough organist, played Handel's Concerto (No. 4) in F. The only event of the character of chamber-music during the month was a concert by the Motto String Quartet on January 29, in the series of Musical Matinees organized by the Misses Smith. Schubert in D minor and Haydn in D minor were the Quartets played; and two modern pieces, 'Londonderry Air' (Frank Bridge) and 'Molly on the shore' (Grainger) completed the programme.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

Newton Abbot Choral Society has suffered financially through deficiency of numbers and lack of public support, but by special efforts the debt has been wiped off and a balance of several pounds deposited at the bank. It has been decided to give a concert-performance of the 'Bohemian Girl' if a sufficient singing membership can be obtained, Mr. W. J. Bown continuing as conductor.

At the annual meeting of the Barnstaple Musical Society an adverse balance of over £9 was reported. 'Elijah' was selected for the next concert, Dr. H. J. Edwards being re-elected hon. conductor. The choir of Chagford Wesleyan Church sang Sullivan's Festival Te Deum on January 16, Mr. Coleridge D. White conducting, and the band being led by Mr. J. Furler.

The 'Pirates of Penzance' has been performed by the newly-formed Holsworthy Amateur Operatic Society, 'A Princess of Kensington' by Torquay Amateur Operatic Society, and 'Utopia, Limited,' by Exeter Amateur Operatic Society.

At a chamber concert given by Signor Clerici at Exeter on January 24, Miss Dorothea Muntz (contralto débutante), Miss Dora Pyle, Miss Gidly (violin), Mrs. Metcalfe (violoncello), the Misses L. Phillips and L. Thompson (pianoforte), and the Isca Glee Singers contributed to an interesting programme.

At Torquay, on January 23, the 'Haydn' String Quartet gave at their twentieth concert Rubinstein's Op. 17, No. 2, and Schumann's Op. 41, No. 3. Miss Eileen Buck was the vocalist.

The Clifton Ladies' Quintet performed a very interesting programme at Bideford on February 15, including works by Brahms (Op. 51, No. 2), MacDowell, Lully, Frank Bridge (Miniatures for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte), Wolstenholme, and Dvorák ('Bagatellen' for two violins, violoncello, and pianoforte, Op. 47). This combination, which has no competitor in the district, consists in personnel of the Misses Avice Sealy, K. Tudor Pole (violins), Gladys Home (viola), Evelyn Pullen (violoncello), May Thomas and Lilian Starling (pianoforte).

CORNWALL.

Marazion Ladies' Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Alan H. Thorne, sang 'The shepherd,' 'Beauteous morn,' 'Memory,' and other pieces on January 16, their quality and ensemble being very good.

Newlyn Choir sang quartets, glees, and choruses at Goldsithney on January 17, conducted by Mr. Harvey; and the newly-formed Choral Society at St. Day gave their first concert on January 23, with a membership of seventy voices, conducted by Rev. W. W. Bickford, part-songs forming the programme. Male choirs from Camborne, Marazion, Falmouth, and Pool, to the number of 150 voices, combined to give a concert at Camborne on January 28, which was highly successful, and in which the Beacon Orchestra assisted. The Cecilia Male Choir, numbering fifty voices, conducted by Mr. T. Downing, showed themselves to be good in balance and tone in several part-songs on January 29. Bodmin Choral Society, under Mr. R. R. Glendinning, have attained a very high standard of artistic and executive performance, and when on January 29 they sang Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' they gave genuine pleasure to a critical audience. A 'Solemn Prelude,' also by Coleridge-Taylor, was played by the band, which was led by Mr. F. A. Wellington. The lamented composer was again memorialised at Launceston on January 30 by a performance by the Choral Society of the first two parts of the 'Hiawatha' trilogy. Mr. C. S. Parsonson, conductor, obtained excellent results from a good choir and band led by Mr. A. Serle, the attack being prompt, the parts well balanced, and the interpretation sympathetic in expression. 'A tale of Old Japan' was also sung on January 31 by Liskeard Choral Society, this being the result of their second year's work under Mr. Walter Weekes. The parts were not altogether well-proportioned, but allowing for this the performance was exceedingly creditable. The band was led by Mr. H. R. V. Ball, and supplied a sympathetic quintet of players who gave Landler's 'Grossmütterchen' as an independent number. At their first concert for this season Merrifield Choral Society, on January 4, sang part-songs and choruses under the baton of Mr. Arthur Greet; and Mr. Charles Spargo (Falmouth) conducted a choir of fifty voices in a programme of sacred pieces at Penryn, on January 4.

In the department of instrumental music the symphony concerts inaugurated in the new Penzance Pavilion must be noted. The second of these, on January 24, was given by the Royal Garrison Artillery Band (Plymouth), conducted by Mr. R. G. Evans, Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony being that selected. Camelford Town Band, conducted by Bandmaster Males, gave a sacred concert on February 2, and the Victoria Road United Methodist Choir gave anthems and choruses. Love Orchestral Society gave a much-appreciated concert on February 3. Mr. L. H. Northam conducted the orchestral members and also a number of glees sung by a well-balanced party of singers. Constantine Brass Band gave a concert on February 4, at which solos and choral numbers were also sung.

Selections from 'The Mikado' were sung by Egloshayle Choir on January 18, and Truro Amateur Operatic Society performed 'Trial by Jury' with much success, on January 20.

DUBLIN.

The Dublin Orchestral Society having emerged from the 1912 season with a balance in hand of £1 13s. 9d., commenced another series of five concerts for the current year on February 19, when Beethoven's first Symphony and Charpentier's 'Impressions d'Italie' were given under Dr. Esposito's direction.

At the Royal Dublin Society the chamber-music recitals have been given during the last month by the following artists: Signor Simonetti, Mr. Clyde Twelvetees, and Dr. Esposito (Beethoven's Op. 1, No. 3, Dr. Esposito's Violin sonata, and Schumann's Op. 63); the Brodsky Quartet (Verdi in E minor, Beethoven's Op. 18, No. 1, and Brahms's Op. 60, with Dr. Esposito at the pianoforte); Mr. Egon Petri (Beethoven's Opp. 78 and 101, César Frank's Prelude, Aria, and Finale, Chopin's Op. 58, Bach's Toccata in C minor, and Variations by Liszt on Bach's Basso ostinato, 'Weinen, Klagen'). With the organ recital by Mr. George Hewson, on February 24, the series for the current season ended.

Violin recitals have been given in the Graham Hotel, on three successive Wednesdays, by Miss Petite O'Hara (assisted by Mrs. Boxwell, pianist), Mr. Joshua F. Watson (assisted by Miss Mabel Lander, pianist, and Miss G. Aldry, vocalist), and Miss Violet Jameson (assisted by Mrs. Boxwell, pianist).

A series of four Sunday Orchestral Concerts, conducted by Dr. Esposito, commenced on February 17, at Woodbrook Bridge, by kind permission of Mr. Stanley Cochrane.

GLASGOW.

The Choral Union's performance of Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend' on January 28 was given under the most favourable conditions. The work, which presents no great choral difficulties, was familiar to the choir, and the performance was directed by the chorus-master, Mr. Henri Verbruggen, whose skilful handling of the Scottish Orchestra in the instrumental part left nothing to be desired. The success of the concert was thus assured. Of the solo vocalists Mr. Charles Victor specially distinguished himself in the part of Lucifer.

The fourteenth Classical Concert on February 4 was one of the most enjoyable of the series, the playing of the Scottish Orchestra, especially in Dvorák's fifth Symphony in E minor ('From the New World') and the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger,' being on the highest level, and the beautiful singing of Miss Lucy Gates more than confirming the favourable impression she made at the previous Saturday Popular Concert.

Following last year's precedent, an invitation orchestral concert was given on February 1, to the senior children attending the Board Schools. The management, however, were not particularly happy in the programme selected for the occasion, and consequently the playing of the band did not receive very rapid attention. If these concerts are to have the educative value intended, it will be well if a considerable measure of school discipline be maintained in the concert-room. It is pleasing to record that the four concerts by the Scottish Orchestra, under municipal auspices, were so entirely successful that the series will probably be extended next year. The Choral and Orchestral Union's season ended with the customary plebiscite concert on February 8. Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony secured first place in the voting, and the inclusion of 'The Ride of the Valkyries' and the Overtures to 'Tannhäuser' (without which no plebiscite programme would be complete) and 'Die Meistersinger' testifies to the concert-goers' partiality for Wagner's music. Miss Elsie Cochrane, a young Glasgow vocalist, who has been studying for some years in Paris, made her first public appearance and proved herself a singer of considerable promise. The season just ended has been very successful in all respects, and it is satisfactory to learn that, financially, the balance is on the right side. Mr. Emil Mlynarski has been re-appointed conductor for next season.

The Western Choral Union, under Mr. Wilfrid Senior, gave their annual concert on February 5. The programme included Handel's 'Acis and Galatea,' and several well-chosen part-songs, in all of which the choir made quite a creditable appearance. The soloists were Miss Helen Gillespie and Messrs. John Booth and Appleton Moore, and Miss May Senior did good work as pianoforte accompanist. The Glasgow Bach Choir gave a highly-interesting chamber concert on February 10. To the enterprise of this choir we owe our acquaintance with many of Bach's less-known works. Last year they brought to a first hearing in Glasgow 'The peasants' cantata,' and on the present occasion they repeated that tuneful work, using a new English edition (the work of Mr. J. M. Diack, the Choir's able conductor), in which several of the solo and concerted numbers have been re-arranged in chorus form. On the instrumental side the programme included the Concerto in D minor for pianoforte (Mr. Lewis Richards) and orchestra (the Athenaeum Orchestral Society), and the 'Brandenburg' Concerto (No. 4) in G, for solo violin, two flutes, and string orchestra. Mr. Verbruggen conducted the orchestral numbers.

The recently-formed Paisley Ladies' Choir, numbering about sixty voices, and conducted by Mr. F. Boothroyd, gave their first concert on February 18. The new choir contains excellent vocal material, and although the balance of parts was not perfect, their singing of an irreproachable selection of part-songs by Coleridge-Taylor, Walford Davies, Elgar, Cunningham Woods, and others, was marked by great refinement and intelligence. An indication of the choir's efforts to depart from the beaten track was their giving for the first time in Scotland an 'Impromptu' for female voices and orchestra by Sibelius, in which the singers had the co-operation of a very complete little orchestra led by Mr. F. Seigl. Vocal solos were given by Miss Myra Dixon and Mr. Herbert Brown.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

With regard to the resignation of Sir Frederic Cowen as permanent conductor of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, the Committee, in making known their arrangements for the coming season, as far as these are completed, state that Sir Frederic has been engaged to conduct four of the concerts, two of them being choral. These will probably be the only choral concerts during the season 1913-14. He will also be responsible for the training of the choir during the whole of the season. Hitherto this highly important work has not lain within his province as the Society's conductor. It will therefore be seen that Sir Frederic has by no means severed his connection with the Society. In fact, in undertaking the duties of chorus-master he has accepted new and onerous responsibilities. It is an experiment the outcome of which will be awaited with interest.

The eminent Russian conductor, M. Safonoff, made a favourable impression at the eighth Philharmonic Concert on January 21. The performance of Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony was one which sounded a personal and intimate note, for the composer and conductor were close friends. Safonoff's method of conducting without a baton achieved striking results, especially in the dreamy opening of Weber's 'Oberon' Overture and also in Bantock's clever Overture 'The pierrot of the minute.' A lucid and masterly performance was given by Mr. Harold Bauer of Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte Concerto. The 'Chorus of Peasants' from Borodin's opera 'Prince Igor' was one of the most dismal things ever heard at these concerts. Sung unaccompanied, the occasional horn notes, which are supposed to help in sustaining the pitch, were wisely omitted in the performance, for at rehearsal they marked a tragic descent of the voices. But this is a reflection on the unvoiced nature of the music rather than on the human material.

The ninth Philharmonic Concert on February 4 was conducted by another eminent guest, conductor J. W. Fritz Steinbach, of Cologne. He specialised in Brahms's music, and it was thought that his interpretation of the master's first Symphony in C minor was symmetrical and enlightening. Mr. Steinbach was seen to equal advantage in the 'Coriolan' Overture and in the delightful Scherzo from Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer's night's Dream.' The vocalist was Madame Lula Myscz-Gmeiner, whose reputation as a lieder singer was supported in her singing of three Schumann songs (with Mr. Steinbach at the pianoforte), and very notably in three remarkable songs by Duparc with orchestral accompaniments. In Brahms's alto Rhapsody the male-voice choir gave a discreet and self-abnegating performance, which they essayed in the German language. The ladies of the choir sang three of Brahms's Trios for female voices with accompaniment for harp and two horns. The alto section sang especially well.

The single visit to be paid this season by the Hallé Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Michael Balling, occurred on January 25. Liverpool as yet knows and admires Mr. Balling chiefly as an opera conductor. With a concert orchestra his influence is not yet equally convincing. Where Mr. Balling scored was in the delicate accompaniments provided for Miss Susanne Morvay in Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto. Berlioz's constructive overture, 'Benvenuto Cellini,' served as a spirited finale. The Symphony was Mozart's 'Jupiter.'

At their concert on February 1, the Welsh Choral Union, conducted by Mr. Harry Evans, gave a performance of the setting of Gray's Ode 'The Bard,' composed by Mr. D. Vaughan Thomas, for the Cardiff Festival of 1910, where it was pronounced to be a work of high aim and considerable achievement. As a composition by one of the most promising Welsh musicians of the day, it entirely enlisted Mr. Harry Evans's sympathies in the success of the performance. If 'The Bard' cannot be termed an epoch-making work it is especially interesting as an illustration of the greatly improved outlook.

The work shows undoubted personality and individuality of style. It is, so to speak, struck off the composer's own anvil. His next essay is awaited with pleasurable anticipation. The baritone soloist was Mr. David Brazell. The composer had a warm call to the platform. By her exhilarating singing and magnificent voice, Miss Ruth Vincent almost electrified her responsive audience, who also warmly greeted Mr. Ben Davies, who was in excellent voice. Miss Marjorie Hayward played several violin solos with great acceptance, and a fine programme was carried through with the usual success. Mr. Harry Evans's powers as an orchestral conductor are too seldom displayed. They had an opportunity on this occasion, and the great choir revelled in Elgar's 'Challenge of Thor.'

At the fifth Symphony Orchestra Concert on January 28, Mr. Vasco Akeroyd conducted Goldmark's melodious 'Im Frühling' Overture, Glazounow's sparkling 'Scènes de ballet,' and Humperdinck's Preludes to Acts 2 and 3 of 'Die Königskinder.' Another interesting novelty was Debussy's 'Danse sacrée' and 'Danse profane' for solo harp (Mr. Charles Collier) and orchestra, and Mr. Anton Maaskoff gave a brilliant violin performance in Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.' Miss Alice Verlet's songs completed the admirable scheme. Little Solomon was a magnet that drew an immense audience to the sixth (and last) of the Akeroyd Symphony Orchestra Concerts on February 11. He was heard in Beethoven's C minor Pianoforte concerto, and in solos. The programme included songs by Signor Tamini, a tenor singer who uses a powerful voice with dramatic intensity, a first hearing of Glazounow's spirited 'Carnival' Overture, Liszt's 'Les préludes,' Gardiner's delightful 'Shepherd Fennel's dance,' and Tchaikovsky's '1812.' Mr. Akeroyd by capable conductorship, and the orchestra by excellent playing throughout the season, have added to the artistic reputation of these well-designed popular concerts.

Mr. Percy Harrison, the Napoleon of modern concert impresarios, assembled a strong company of well-known artists at his concert in the Philharmonic Hall on January 29, which (as usual) was well-attended. The programme was a happy blend of classical and popular, and it goes without saying that it was carried out to perfection by Madame Donalds, Madame Ada Crossley, and Messrs. Backhaus and Kreisler, with Mr. R. J. Forbes a resourceful accompanist.

At the meeting of the Rodewald Concert Club on January 27, the Albion Trio, of London—Miss Louise Aumonier (pianoforte), Miss Dorothea Walenn (violin), and Miss Phyllis Hasluck (violoncello)—made a favourable impression by their skilful and expressive playing in Beethoven's Trio in D, Op. 70, No. 1, Brahms's Trio in B, Op. 8, and a new Trio 'Suite,' 'Sur des chants Bretons,' by Jean Hüré. In four movements of varying mood, 'Gai et animé,' 'Tendre et mélancolique,' 'Avec abandon et tristesse,' and 'Vif et badin,' it is permeated by suggestions of the Celtic folk-songs upon which it is based. Chiefly of melancholy trend, the music has a definite if elusive charm. The eighth concert, on February 10, was held in a small and overcrowded room in the Compton Hotel, where the conditions were not altogether favourable. Glazounow's string Quartet in F, Op. 10, was played by the Edith Robinson Quartet, who were signally reinforced by Mr. Frederic Brandon in Brahms's Pianoforte quintet. Miss Mary Anderton was agreeably heard in songs by Schumann, Hugo Wolf, and Elgar.

A recital was given by Miss Mary Leighton in a wide variety of songs sung in the Rushworth Hall, on February 1. It is seldom one hears a voice used so evenly and effectively throughout its range. Among other things she sang a song-cycle of graceful if not forceful lyrics, 'Garden pictures,' accompanied by the composer, Miss Margaret Whitcombe. The vocal items were interspersed with solos intelligently played by Mr. Lloyd-Powell, a young pianist of promise. A paper on Edward MacDowell was read by Mr. W. A. Wrigley, of Manchester, before the local section of the I.S.M. in the Royal Institution on February 8. Well-chosen vocal examples were sung by Mrs. Cearn Owen and Miss Annie Beattie, and Mr. Frederic Brandon contributed a masterly performance of the tremendous 'Eroica' Sonata, in addition to several of the better known smaller pianoforte works which were charmingly played.

Under Mr. William Faulkes's conductorship the Anfield Orchestral Society continues to prosper, and a creditable performance of Saint-Saëns's 'La jeunesse d'Hercule' was given at their concert on January 29. The vocalists were Miss Florence Smith and Mr. Alfred Young. A similar powerful Cheshire combination, the Liscard Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Philip Smart, gave a successful concert on February 8, at which Miss Marjorie Bond-Andrews sang and Mr. Stanley Redfern was solo flautist.

A performance of Cowen's 'Rose-Maiden' was given by the recently revived University Musical Society in the Arts Theatre on January 25. The enthusiasm of the present conductor, Mr. J. A. Davies, is usefully employed on promising material, although the choir only numbers about forty. It is worthy of note that it was not necessary to go outside of the members to find competent soloists.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

With the closing days of January the several streams of Manchester's orchestral music were once more in full flood, and conductors Balling, Speelman, and Wood have each done notable work. Since my last message, Balling's performances have been of such a nature as to lead to some modification of earlier impressions. Only once before, at a semi-private concert, had Mahler figured in a Manchester programme prior to January 30, when his first Symphony was introduced. Written a quarter of a century since by one who was considered a fit successor to Richter at Vienna, few things could better exemplify the extraordinary state of affairs in Manchester which could permit such a tardy recognition of so considerable a composer; so badly posted were the authorities here that they deemed this the first performance of the Symphony in England, until Mr. Robert Newman, of the London Queen's Hall, enlightened the public. Hopes of gaining a further acquaintance this season with Mahler's later symphonic works have (at time of writing) just been extinguished, so an interesting comparison cannot be made. This work is as far removed from the abnormal both in subject matter and style of presentation as could well be imagined; chock-full of long melodious passages, sanely orchestrated, leading up to a climax of quite sublime character—it left a fine impression.

'The Hymn to the Rising Sun' of another Viennese writer, Richard Mandl, which followed, is a finely sonorous work for strings, harps, and organ. Heard at rehearsal in an empty hall it seemed imposing, but at a second hearing several hours later its real dignity was not so apparent, and probably its appeal would diminish on further acquaintance; it would serve a useful purpose at such a Festival as that of the 'Three Choirs' perhaps, where a really fine organ could be used. Mr. C. H. Fogg, who played on this occasion, deserved a better instrument.

Just why Roger Ducasse's 'Suite Française' was repeated by request it would be hard to say. Whilst it has a certain hard, glittering brilliancy, its most ardent admirer could not call it worthy of comparison, say, with Suites of Tchaikovsky or Glazounow.

Ten years ago, two or three north-country musical devotees heard a performance at the Düsseldorf Lower Rhine Festival under Richard Strauss of the 'Faust' Symphony of Liszt. So strong an impression did it make (particularly of Strauss's affinity with Liszt) that Dr. Richter was prevailed upon to perform the work here; but despite this sturdy Lisztianer's best efforts the Symphony fell absolutely flat, to the intense chagrin of the Düsseldorf visitors. Since then much water has flowed under Manchester's musical bridges. Richter kept pegging away to remove the reproach that in Manchester 'they do not like Liszt.' The recent season of guest conductors brought one or two virtuoso Berlioz and Liszt interpreters, and at the recent second performance in Manchester of the 'Faust' Symphony one felt justified, in view of the warmth of its reception, in saying that at last Liszt had entered into his kingdom.

The conducting of this Symphony was easily the finest work, in an orchestral sense, that Baling has done here; he energizes all the music he touches, just as Richter ennobles all he plays or as Wood clarifies every score. This energetic treatment became well the closing 'Mephisto' section, and I felt that the apotheosis of the 'Ewigweibliche zieht uns hinan' grew inevitably out of the preceding matter, and we had a finale of overpowering beauty and sublimity, in which the large male-voice choir played an important part.

Berlioz's 'Te Deum' is quite in a class by itself; modern choral and orchestral climaxes—particularly Elgar's—may have robbed it of much of its power to astonish, but, as with most of Berlioz's works, the oftener you hear them the more you come under the fascination of his phrase and style—he wears well. Once the Hallé Society was regarded as the chief apostle of Berlioz in England—worse things might happen than that, in this respect, the mantle of Charles Hallé should fall upon Baling and a worthy tradition thus be maintained.

On February 6 he conducted for the first time the 'Dream of Gerontius,' and here one got the clearest indications of the change which has come over the choir under the new régime, because steeped (as Baling must be) in the 'Parsifal' tradition, there would be much in the work that would fall in quite naturally with Baling's style, such as the co-ordination of the various choral units at several important points in the work's development. The right atmosphere was instantly created, and—more important—never lost. There have been nine or ten performances of this work since 1901 in this city, but I question whether the marvellous beauty of the orchestration has ever been so clearly unfolded, even under Elgar's own direction; those who thought they knew their 'Gerontius' intimately were constantly pricking their ears at these fresh revelations. Baling did not secure (as perhaps Richter alone can) that sense of natural and inevitable growth in the quickening tempi during the course of the long hymn of 'Praise to the Holiest in the Height'; but much may be forgiven him in virtue of the fine imaginative treatment of the demonic oburgatory passages on the one hand, or the absolute beauty and serenity of the closing 'Farewell' music—no performance of the twenty or more that I have heard equalled, much less surpassed, this. Miss Phyllis Lett sang the part of the Angel, Mr. Gervase Elwes, as Gerontius, sang like one inspired, and Mr. Robert Maitland was the bass.

The Wagner 'In Memoriam' concert on February 13 (anniversary of his birth) opened with Liszt's 'Heldenklage,' which has uncommonly little of the heroic quality about it, Siegfried's 'Trauermarsch' seeming more in accord with the fitness of things. Petri's re-appearance drew large and enthusiastic troops of his student-admirers, but even they would have preferred that he did not waste his valuable talents on the Beethoven Choral Fantasia, even if it does contain the germ-thought of a later and immortal work.

The chief honours at the recent Saturday 'Proms.' have gone to instrumental soloists. Mr. Frederick Dawson, on February 1, in association with Mr. Speelman, played Liszt's E flat Concerto with superb defiance, and a week earlier Miss Daisy Kennedy aroused similar enthusiasm when playing with Sir Henry Wood in the Mendelssohn Concerto. Mr. Speelman, on February 16, conducted Strauss's early work for thirteen wind instruments, when even the tuba was found to have considerable independent beauty. There can be little doubt that the good-natured, wholesome rivalry between these two Saturday night organizations is already having a beneficial effect both on orchestras and audiences.

Not much orchestral music of distinction has been performed at the Gentlemen's Concerts, but the recognition afforded to a couple of local artists was eminently satisfactory. Mr. Charles Neville is developing rapidly in operatic work with the Carl Rosa people, and his Wagner and Mozart singing, no less than his Wolf and Reger Liedern, show him to be more than usually competent as an all-round musician. On January 29, the gentleman responsible for the music at Miss Horniman's Gaiety Theatre, Mr. Sokoloff, played the Lekeu Sonata with Mr. Forbes. On the same date Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Hartly gave a noteworthy recital.

Following the recent Korngold works at the Hallé concert and at Mr. Max Meyer's chamber-concert, Mr. Isidor Cohn played all Korngold's published pianoforte work. The Sonatas many found baffling, but the 'Märchenbilder,' belonging to the same period as the second Sonata (June to December, 1910), were found more easily comprehensible, and the Epilogue was re-played. Mr. Cohn is as keen an enthusiast for Korngold as is Mr. S. Langford for Reger.

The celebration of the Kaiser's birthday among the German colony here has always possessed musical distinction, but under the consulate of Captain Theodor Schlagintweit these festivities have brought Mozart's 'Bastien and Bastienne' and Wolf-Ferrari's 'Susannah's secret' to a first hearing. Now we have to add Pergolesi's operetta 'La Serva Padrona,' written three years before his untimely death at twenty-six years of age. A fine young baritone from Bremen (Herr H. Meyer) came over specially for the part of Pandolfo, Miss Schlagintweit and Mr. Leslie Langford completing the cast of this sprightly Mozartian operetta, which came twenty-three years before the birth of Mozart.

As a result, no doubt, of Mr. Cecil Sharp's visits here, interest has been roused in folk-dance perhaps more than in folk-lore and folk-song. On February 1, Miss Mary Neal showed what was possible with youngsters trained in various parts of the country and assembled for the purposes of joint performance. During the week February 17-23, Miss Margaret Morris's children from the Court Theatre gave numerous peasant dances and a couple of ballets.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

A quartet of musical lectures, all well-attended, speaks of a desire to know something of the art. Mr. Cecil Sharp dealt with English Folk-song on Sunday and Monday, February 2 and 3, and during his visit took part in a meeting establishing a Society for the cultivation of Folk and Morris dancing. Mr. E. L. Bainton addressed the members of the local section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians and friends on the subject of 'Modern English music,' and complained strongly of the unsympathetic attitude of the British public to its own native products. Illustrations by Cyril Scott and Balfour Gardiner were beautifully played by the lecturer; and six interesting songs by Vaughan-Williams, Bath, Grainger, Cyril Scott, Boughton, and Farrar were sung. Mr. Ernest J. Potts gave fine interpretations of the three last-named.

At the Literary and Philosophical Institute Dr. Walford Davies delivered an earnest and thoughtful lecture on 'Thought and Feeling in Music' on December 17, in which he combated the notion so prevalent in many minds of the intellectual type that music was merely the unbalanced expression of emotion.

The Chamber Music Society gave a vocal and pianoforte recital on January 24. Mr. Theodore Byard sang the whole of the 'Dichterliebe,' sympathetically accompanied by Mr. O'Connor Morris, and showed how delightful a vocalist without exceptional qualities of voice could be. Mr. Sapellnikoff gave brilliant but cold performances of Beethoven's last Pianoforte sonata, and groups of Chopin and Liszt.

The third Harrison Concert the following Thursday did not contain much of artistic value except the contributions of the matchless artist Kreisler, who, in addition to solos, joined Mr. Wilhelm Backhaus in Grieg's third Sonata for pianoforte and violin, which was played with insight and appreciation. Mesdames Donalds and Ada Crossley also appeared.

On the last day of January the Philharmonic Orchestra introduced Franck's Symphony to Newcastle. The work created an immediate and profound impression, and there is a universal desire for an early repetition. The conductor, Mr. E. L. Bainton, proved himself a virtuoso of no mean gifts in Grieg's Pianoforte concerto, although technique was throughout subordinated to interpretation. A striking and original 'Spring idyll' by Mr. H. O. Anderson was played, and proved a welcome novelty. Mozart's 'Figaro' Overture and Brahms's 'Variations on a theme of Haydn' completed the programme.

NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

An interesting concert was given by the Norwich Philharmonic Society under the direction of Dr. Bates at St. Andrew's Hall, on January 30, when Beethoven's 'Pastoral' Symphony and Weber's 'Oberon' Overture were performed. Szigeti was the solo violinist, and contributed the solo part in Brahms's Concerto for violin and orchestra and three solos, receiving great applause for his admirable playing. Miss Dora Arnell was the vocalist, and her songs were by Max Bruch, Hindemith, Coleridge-Taylor, and Korbyay. The concert attracted a large audience.

The Norwich Chamber Music Society gave a concert at the Assembly Rooms, Theatre Square, on February 6, when the programme included a String quartet by Haydn, Brahms's Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte in E minor, and Schubert's String quintet in C major. The solo violoncellist was Miss Helen Beeching; and Miss Irma Colenso contributed five songs by Sibelius, Goldmark, Richard Strauss, and Coleridge-Taylor.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The Charity Subscription Concert on January 16 proved an interesting event, with items by Miss Violet Oppenshaw, Miss May Mukle, Mr. Percy Grainger, Mr. Stanley Hawley, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Miss Lena Ashwell, who took the place of Miss Constance Collier. If there was a palm to be distributed amongst this galaxy of talent, it would be most popularly given to the pianist, Mr. Percy Grainger, for his playing of Schumann's Romance in F sharp minor.

Miss Lily Crawford, to whom great credit is due for her efforts to give the songs of all nations in our own tongue, gave a vocal recital on January 21. She was assisted by Miss Isolde Menges, whose violin playing created a very good impression.

Among the regular concerts, that in aid of the Samaritan Hospital holds a prominent position, and took place on January 23, when the programme was furnished by Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Carmen Hill, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Charles Tree, with Mr. John Munday (violoncello) and Miss Emily Roseblade (pianoforte).

The annual concert of the William Woolley Choral Society took place also on January 23, when part-songs were interpreted with even more than the customary excellence. The programme, culled from Brahms, Elgar, Coleridge-Taylor, and Parry, was exacting in its demands, but was ably performed. The Nottingham Harmonic Quartette received warm applause for their share in the programme, and Miss Lizzie Parsons proved herself a worthy accompanist and a brilliant pianist.

The South Wilford Choral Society gave a very successful performance of German's 'Merrie England' on January 24. The choir did their work well, and the solo parts were allotted to Madame Middleton Woodward, Madame Farnsworth, Mr. Ernest Fisher, and Mr. Albert Farnsworth, all of whom contributed largely to the success of the performance, which was well-prepared and ably directed by Mr. F. V. Sadler; Mr. Pickerill led the orchestra.

Miss Augustine Bisiaux gave her annual violin recital on January 29, when her programme included works by César Franck and Max Bruch. She was ably assisted by Mr. Humphrey Bishop (vocalist), Mr. Herbert Lees (recitalist), and Mr. Hollings (pianist).

The Sacred Harmonic Society gave a fine performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' and Hubert Bath's 'The wedding of Shon Maclean,' on February 6. There was something exceptional in the performance of these two works; the unanimity of choir and orchestra, the quality of the choral tone as well as their instantaneous response to all demands, produced a thrilling effect. The solos were capably sung by Miss Emily Breare, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Stewart Gardner; the first and last were new to Nottingham, but will be welcome visitors in the future. To Mr. Allen Gill warm praise is due both for the careful preparation and the excellent result.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

The event of moment in Leeds music during the past month has been the resumption of the 'Leeds Municipal Concerts' under the title of the 'Leeds Saturday Orchestral Concerts.' The change is more than verbal, for it means that, as the support of the Corporation has proved a broken reed, the concerts have been revived on a purely voluntary basis. The fact that the Chairman of the new committee is the Vice-Chancellor of Leeds University may be taken as something more than a passive acceptance of the movement, for it is a fact that Dr. Sadler and many of his staff take a lively interest in it. So far two concerts have been given—on January 25 and February 8—in the Town Hall, by the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, which is composed of the best local professionals, under the direction of Mr. Fricker. On both occasions there was a very large audience, and the marked enthusiasm suggested that Leeds people welcome the resumption of what was becoming one of the most hopeful features of Leeds musical life, enabling them to hear the highest type of music at prices of admission varying from threepence to half-a-crown. Among the works in these two programmes were Beethoven's eighth Symphony and Schubert's 'Unfinished,' Grieg's Pianoforte concerto (the solo part played by Mr. Frederick Dawson with exhilarating brilliance), 'The Midsummer night's Dream' and 'Meistersinger' Overtures, and, in lighter vein, the 'Casse Noisette' and 'Arlésienne' Suites. An element of novelty—always a doubtful experiment in a 'popular' programme—was supplied in a selection from the precocious Erich Korngold's 'Snow Man' music and Percy Grainger's lively 'Mock Morris.' The beginning has certainly been most auspicious, and it now remains to be seen whether this enthusiasm will be lasting, or is only a flash-in-the-pan. One hopes for the best, but previous experience of Leeds music inclines one to a rather pessimistic attitude.

On January 29 the Leeds Philharmonic Society gave a concert which was nominally orchestral, but, according to a custom which some of its supporters deprecate, was interlarded with short choral works: Goetz's 'Nenia' and Charles Wood's 'Dirge for two veterans.' Opportunities for hearing choral music, more important than these, are numerous enough at Leeds, and it seems to involve a certain waste when the Hallé Orchestra is brought over and a material part of the programme is expended on choral compositions. Room was, however, found for some important orchestral works, Mozart's ever-green Symphony in G minor being contrasted with Strauss's 'Zarathustra,' and Wallace's 'Villon' and Reger's Lustspiel Overture being given under Mr. Balling's direction. In the way of chamber music Leeds is not so deficient as in other directions. On January 22, the Rasch Quartet, which is going to lose its leader, who has accepted a post in Germany, gave Mozart's String quintet (with two violas) in E flat, and Bruckner's Quintet in F, for the same combination of instruments, a work which, like so many of his, is full of interest, has many passages of genuine poetic charm, and narrowly escapes absolute greatness. On February 5, the Leeds Bohemian Concerts (now arrived at their fourteenth season) introduced three string quartets, all intensely interesting. The first of the 'Rassoumovsky' Quartets is a masterpiece, even among Beethoven's chamber works; Dohnányi's Quartet in D flat is a delightful composition, and in Walford Davies's 'Peter Pan' Suite we have a work by a native composer showing delightful fancy, and exceedingly well written for the instruments. The spirit with which these were played by the Quartet led by Mr. Alex. Cohen was delightful, and evoked much enthusiasm.

On January 15 Mr. Elliott, a well-known local violinist, with Mr. Whitelock, an equally well-known flautist, gave a concert at which some interesting and unfamiliar music was heard: a Quartet by Mozart for flute and strings; a Flute sonata by Blavet, an 18th-century composer; a String quartet by Cui; and Suites by Zimbalist, Moszkowski, and Verhey formed a programme which represented well the lighter aspect of artistic music. On January 22, Sapellnikoff appeared at a Leeds Musical Evening, and played all four of Chopin's Ballades in masterly style; and recitals by Miss Lilian Emerson on January 24, and on February 7 by three young musicians—Miss Nora Baldwin (violin), Miss Mabel Corbishley (pianoforte), and Mr. W. T. James (baritone)—deserve mention. At the Leeds Musical Evening on February 18, Miss Nora Moon, a young West Riding soprano, gave a vocal recital with a very varied programme, which she sustained with much skill and intelligence.

BRADFORD.

At the Bradford Subscription Concert on January 17 Miss Irene Scharrer was the pianist, and, with the boy violinist, Feuermann, played César Franck's Sonata in A in a style that was remarkable in view of the violinist's extreme youth. Miss Helga Petri and Mr. Roland Jackson were the vocalists. At the next concert, on January 31, Mr. Balling and the Hallé Orchestra gave an exceptionally fine reading of Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony, emotional without exaggeration. The final scene from 'Götterdämmerung' (with Miss Edith Evans) and the Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan' were given with that warmth which Mr. Balling is so well able to infuse into Wagner's music, and, as at Leeds two days before, Reger's 'Lustspiel' Overture and Wallace's 'Villon' formed features of the programme. At the concert on February 14, Mr. Landon Ronald, with the New Symphony Orchestra, gave Elgar's second Symphony—a brilliant reading, on which great pains had been bestowed—together with the 'Don Juan' of Richard Strauss and Debussy's 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune.'

Two of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra's concerts, on January 18 and February 15, call for notice. On the former occasion Mr. Julian Clifford conducted Beethoven's second Symphony, his own pleasant 'New Year' Overture, and some popular pieces like the 'Peer Gynt' Suite, of which good performances were given. At the latter concert Mr. Allen Gill was the conductor, and introduced the 'Hebrides,' 'Verkaufte Braut,' and 'Flying Dutchman' Overtures, Mr. Arthur Catterall giving an artistic interpretation of three movements from Lalo's 'Symphonie Espagnole.' These concerts are now in their twenty-first year, and have done a good work for Bradford, such as one hopes may be accomplished for Leeds by the Saturday concerts.

Mr. Midgley is continuing for their third season the Free Chamber Concerts which, with the help of some musical philanthropists, he has established at Bradford. On January 13 Violin sonatas by Brahms and Dvorák, on January 27 Schubert's String quintet in C and Beethoven's early Pianoforte quartet in E flat, and on February 10 Schubert's fine if lengthy Pianoforte trio in E flat, Gade's Trio in F, and Beethoven's Violin sonata in A (Op. 12, No. 2) were given to attentive audiences, whose interest was enhanced by the short explanations and analyses given before each work was played. The performers, among whom were several vocalists, were all Bradford musicians. On February 12 Mr. Alfred Barker (violin), Mr. E. Gibson-Young (baritone), assisted by a clever reciter, Miss Dunlop, gave a concert in which they demonstrated their very considerable artistic attainments.

OTHER TOWNS.

The Wakefield Chamber Concerts brought an interesting season to a close on February 6, with a concert to which the fine ensemble of the London String Quartet gave exceptional charm. Mendelssohn's Quartet in F (Op. 44, No. 3) was listened to with interest, because it is so seldom heard nowadays, but the reason for its neglect appeared when it was followed by Brahms's Clarinet quintet (with Mr. Cooper as clarinetist), a work which made Mendelssohn's polished music seem very thin indeed. Quartet movements by Balfour Gardiner and Percy Grainger held their own well among the masters. Emil Sjögren's Sonata in C minor for violin and pianoforte was introduced by Mr. John Dunn and Mr. Lloyd Hartley in the programme of a vocal recital given by Miss Edith Lofthouse on January 22.

At the Huddersfield Subscription Concert, on January 28, Sapellnikoff and Zacharewitsch, with Miss Mignon Nevada and Mr. Theodore Byard as vocalists, supplied an excellent programme. The Huddersfield Philharmonic Society gave, on February 1, what was styled on rather slender grounds a 'grand operatic night.' Under Mr. Ibeson's conductorship the amateur orchestra played, in creditable fashion, a programme of which the most distinguished feature was a 'selection,' of little artistic worth, from Gounod's 'Roméo et Juliette.' Misses Mary Swailes (vocalist), M. E. Beaneland (violin) and Ada Goodwin (pianoforte) appeared as soloists.

At Bridlington an occurrence of unusual importance took place on January 28, when the local Amateur Operatic Society produced an entirely new opera by Mr. Bernard Johnson, entitled 'The Petticoat Prince.' The libretto, by Mr. 'C. Winthrop,' has a clever if rather complicated plot, concerning the political intrigues of a kingdom in the romantic region of the Balkans, developed in accordance with the fantastic methods of the Gilbert and Sullivan drama. To this Mr. Johnson has added music that is always refined, light, melodious, and graceful, and the work as a whole will certainly compare well with many of its kind that achieve popularity. Under the composer's direction, a most animated performance was given. The amateur cast, most ably coached by Mr. K. C. Luxton as stage-manager, and Mr. H. Pickard as chorus-master, was efficient in every detail; the chorus was excellent, and of the principals, mention must be made of Mr. Hubert Grantham's fine performance as the hero, and Miss Dorothy Cranswick's bright impersonation of the heroine.

On January 21, the Hull Vocal Society gave an 'all British' concert, the choir, under Dr. G. H. Smith, singing part-music by English composers from Benet to Parry, and the vocalists—Miss Mabel Manson and Mr. Albert Garcia—choosing only English songs. On January 29 the newly-organized Scarborough Musical Society gave their first concert, at which Mr. A. C. Keeton conducted Cowen's 'John Gilpin,' of which a creditable performance was given. Mr. Charles Tree was the principal vocalist. On January 29 the Rasch Quartet appeared at one of Mr. Hylton Stewart's chamber concerts, and were heard in String quartets by Beethoven (in F, Op. 18, No. 1) and Schumann (in A). Mr. Bruce Hylton Stewart sang, among other things, some of Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea,' accompanied by a male-vocal choir. Sapellnikoff and the gifted young Australian violinist, Miss Daisy Kennedy, appeared at the Doncaster Subscription Concert on January 13; and at the Hull (Janssen) Subscription Concert on February 13, Ernst von Lengyel was the pianist and Hollman the violoncellist, the fine Lieder singing of Mr. Robert Maitland being a feature of the occasion. On February 12 a chamber concert was given in connection with the Middlesbrough Musical Union, Pianoforte trios by Schubert (in B flat, Op. 99) and Brahms (in C, Op. 87) being played by Miss Elzy, Messrs. Sammons and Withers. A performance of 'Elijah' in Dewsbury Parish Church, on January 30, merits notice. It was under the direction of Mr. G. H. Hirst, the organist, and Mr. H. P. Richardson undertook the task of accompanying at the organ. Mr. W. Hayle was the 'Elijah,' and Miss Hirst the principal soprano.

Country and Colonial News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—It is a high tribute to the musical progress of Aberdeen, which has been most active since the introduction of the Competition Festival Movement, that Bach's choral music is receiving conspicuous attention. Among the numerous examples of enthusiasm for Bach, either achieved or in prospect, the performance of the Cantatas 'Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit' and 'Ich hatte viel Bekummernis,' by the Aberdeen Bach Society on February 8 deserves honourable mention. Inspired by Mr. Clemens's teaching the choir treated these works with full respect for their character as music and as worship, and brought to their service an adequate choral technique. The work of the solo singers was capably and appropriately performed by Miss Janet Burt, Mrs. McAllan, Mr. H. McAlison, and Mr. J. B. O'Connor.

BELFAST.—The Philharmonic Society gave their third concert of the season on February 7. Considerable interest was lent to the event by the presence of Mr. Percy Grainger as solo pianist. Two of his compositions—the arrangement of a Londonderry folk-song for chorus, and the clog dance, 'Handel in the Strand,' for strings and pianoforte—were included in the programme. Mlle. Alice Verlet contributed songs, and Miss Dorothy de Vin violin solos. A ladies' string orchestra conducted by Mr. E. Godfrey Brown played with rare power and refinement. Miss Carrodus Taylor, a local violoncellist, was associated with them in an expressive performance of Volkmann's Serenade in D minor. The choir acquitted themselves very creditably in part-songs by Bantock, Morley, and others.

BELPER.—Haydn's 'Spring' was the chief feature in the programme of the annual choral concert given at the Wesleyan School-room on February 4, under the direction of Mr. John B. Gough. The solo parts were taken by Madame Edith Hayes, Mr. Herbert Gregory, and Mr. Harold Beresford. Pinsuti's 'A spring song,' German's 'The chase,' and Sullivan's 'The long day closes' were the smaller choral numbers.

BRAMPTON.—A spirited performance of Mr. John E. West's concert-version of Gounod's 'Faust' was given by the Choral Society, on January 30, under the direction of Mr. F. Drakeford. The choir and orchestra numbered 120. The soloists were Madame Isa Walton, Mr. Edwin Morgan, Mr. James Martin, and Mr. Ernest J. Potts.

BRIGHTON.—'Elijah' was again performed by the Sacred Harmonic Society at the Dome, on February 6, and Mr. Robert Taylor's conductorship was again responsible for an individual and significant interpretation of the work. The chorals responded with enthusiasm and fine tone. The chief solo parts were taken by Miss Mary Lund, Miss May Parker, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. Charles Knowles. —On the same evening an ambitious programme of chamber-music was successfully carried out under Miss Marian Mennich's direction, at the Music Room, Montpelier Road. —The performance of Sullivan's 'The golden legend,' given on January 22 by the Municipal Chorus and Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Lyell-Taylor, was a decisive success, the Dome being filled with an enthusiastic audience. The choir was heard to advantage in every respect, and excellent work was done by the soloists, Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Ethel Harman, Mr. Gwilym Richards, Mr. F. Adhemer, and Mr. William Waite. On February 12, Mascagni's 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and a miscellaneous selection were given.

CANTERBURY.—The Canterbury Male-Voice Choir gave its annual concert in the Theatre Royal on January 14, before a crowded audience. Messrs. Donald Reid and Sidney Coltham sang songs with a choral accompaniment, and the choir gave in excellent style part-songs by Cooke, Otto, Neumann, Brewer, Lee Williams, Laurent de Rille, G. W. Martin, Brahms, Stehle, Sullivan, and Schumann. Mr. Alex. Reid conducted. —The same choir visited Margate earlier in January, and gave a highly-successful concert at the Pavilion.

CHELMSFORD.—Mr. F. R. Frye's Choral Society gave their second concert of the season on January 28, at the Shire Hall. The choral selection was Elgar's 'The dance' and 'Go, song of mine,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Summer is gone' and 'The sea-shell,' and Walford-Davies's 'Nursery rhymes,' all being sung with much charm of manner. The soloists were Miss Louise Macbean and Mr. Ernest Stepan. Mr. C. A. Crabbe played some violoncello solos in excellent style. Happy features of the concert were recitations by Mr. Charles Fry, the well-known elocutionist. Miss Ethel Warmsley was the accompanist, and Mr. F. R. Frye conducted.

CROWBOROUGH.—Gade's 'Spring's message' and a selection of part-songs were creditably sung by the Crowborough and Jarvis Brook Musical Society, at a recent concert. The part-songs included Edward German's 'My bonnie lass she smileth.' Mr. E. Grimm conducted.

CULHAM (OXON.).—The annual College Concert took place on February 3 before a large audience containing many well-known musicians in the University and district. The excellent College Orchestra, composed entirely of students, numbered fifty-four performers, and the Choral Society, whose membership is seventy, was represented by a special glee-party. The full orchestra gave most praiseworthy performances of Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody,' Stanford's Overture, 'Shamus O'Brien,' and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony. This last work is the most ambitious task attempted by the orchestra up to the present, and the result was highly creditable. The Choral Society sang with vigour and precision a number of part-songs, which included Elgar's 'Feasting, I watch' and Schumann's 'Song of freedom.' The orchestra was most capably led by Mr. Lister Pengelly, and the musical director of the College, the Rev. A. S. Arrowsmith, lent his usual efficient services as conductor.

DARTFORD.—The Wellcome Philharmonic Society, founded by Mr. H. S. Wellcome and formed of members of the staff of the Wellcome Chemical Works, gave an orchestral concert on February 7. Mozart's G minor Symphony, 'Finlandia,' and the 'Meistersinger' Overture were the chief numbers. Mr. Arthur Green and Mr. Harold Rogerson were solo vocalist and pianist, and Dr. H. A. D. Jowett conducted.

DUMFRIES.—The Ladies' Choir, conducted by Mr. J. W. Cheadle, gave an excellent concert on February 7 at the Town Hall. The chief work in the programme was Ethel M. Boyce's 'The sands of Corriemie,' which was poetically sung by the choir and the soloist, Mrs. Cheadle. The programme also included a selection of part-songs and solos.

DUNEDIN (N.Z.).—The 'Liedertafel,' which was established in 1886 as a double quartet, now contains fifty-three members, and has been conducted by Mr. Jesse Timson since 1894. The hundredth concert took place on December 3. Félicien David's 'The desert' formed the chief number on the programme, and a selection of part-songs was made from the early repertory of the Society.

EDINBURGH.—The programme of the concert of the Amateur Orchestral Society given on February 10, under the direction of Mr. T. H. Collinson, included Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture, the 'Jena' Symphony, Berlioz's Overture, 'The Flight into Egypt,' and Karg-Elert's Suite in A minor on themes by Bizet. The last-mentioned work was given for the first time in England. The soloist of the occasion was Miss Marie Thomson.

GRIMSBY.—On January 16, Mr. Frederick Dawson gave a most artistic performance of Beethoven's 'Appassionata' Sonata and pieces by Scarlatti, Schumann, Chopin, Mendelssohn, Debussy, and Liszt. Pianoforte recitals being infrequent in this town, Mr. Dawson's visit was the more welcome. —A week of Gilbert and Sullivan by the D'Oyly Carte Company proved as attractive as ever to the Grimsby public, and even greater local interest has been shown in a week's performances of 'Merrie England' by the Amateur Operatic Society.

IPSWICH.—An exceptionally interesting concert was given by the Choral Society on January 22, under the able direction of Mr. William Hockey. Purcell's Ode 'St. Cecilia's Day,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' formed a programme that demanded contrasted methods of treatment and a considerable range of expressive power. The choralsists responded with a readiness that spoke of good training. The chorus, 'Soul of the world,' from Purcell's work, was a conspicuous example. The programme further included solos by Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Maud Wright, and Mr. Alfred Heather, who, with Mr. Constantine Morris, took the principal parts in the cantata. Mr. Charles Holland was at the organ.

KIRRIEMUIR.—The advanced standard of the work of the Amateur Operatic Society was exemplified on February 12 by a performance of 'The Yeomen of the Guard,' under the direction of Mr. H. E. Peacock. All the solo parts were well filled, and an excellent chorus assisted.

LEAMINGTON.—On January 30, Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was performed at the Parish Church by the Madrigal Society, under the direction of Mr. E. Roberts West. The singing was at the high standard characteristic of the Society, and a significant interpretation of the work was given. The solo parts were well sung by Madame Laura Taylor, Miss Marjorie Lees, Mr. Ernest Ludlow, and Mr. Arthur Cranmer.

LICHFIELD.—Elgar's 'King Olaf' was the principal fare provided by the Lichfield Musical Society at their concert on February 4. A very creditable interpretation of the choral music was given under the direction of Mr. J. B. Lott, and work of a high class was done by the soloists, Madame Aston, Mr. R. Ripley, and Mr. J. Coleman. The programme also included a miscellaneous section in which solos were given by the principals, and Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture and four of Dvorák's 'Slavonic Dances' were played by the orchestra.

NEWCASTLE (STAFFORDSHIRE).—The Male-Voice Glee Union gave a concert on January 30, with a well-chosen programme. Admirable interpretations were given of Bantock's 'Boot and saddle' and 'The piper o' Dundee,' Bishop's 'I gave my harp to sorrow's hand,' Mackenzie's 'A Franklyn's dogge,' and Brahms's 'Lullaby,' and the choir gave the first performance of a vivid and elaborate setting of Tennyson's 'The charge of the Light Brigade,' written by their conductor, Mr. S. E. Lovatt. Solos were provided by Miss Evangeline Florence, Mr. Herbert Brown, and Mr. Walter Hatton (violincellist).

PURLEY.—At St. Augustine's Hall, South Croydon, on January 27, 'Hiawatha' (all three parts) was sung by the Choral Union to an overflowing and enthusiastic audience. The soloists were Miss Maude Wilby, Mr. Herbert Eisdell, and Mr. Dan Richards. The leader of the orchestra was Miss Gertrude Baker. Mr. Harold Macpherson conducted.

REIGATE.—On Monday evening, February 3, the Choral Society gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' (three parts), with the assistance of a full orchestra, before a packed audience, at the Public Hall. The solo parts were taken by Miss Maude Wilby, Mr. Herbert Eisdell, and Mr. Dan Richards, and Mr. Harold Macpherson conducted.

SCUNTHORPE.—The programme of the concert given on January 30 by the Scunthorpe Choral Society, of which Mr. F. C. Nicholson is conductor, consisted of Gounod's 'Faust.' The solo artists engaged were Miss Carrie Lanceley, Miss Edith Allen, Mr. Henry Beaumont, Mr. Joseph Lycett, Mr. Constantine Morris, and Mr. A. W. Geary.

SHERINGHAM.—On February 4 the Musical Society gave a splendid performance of Cowen's 'Rose maiden,' under the able conductorship of Mr. Fred. Kemp. The soloists were Miss Gladys Riches, Miss Ethel Hindes, Mr. Percy Tyrrel, and Mr. F. Bird.

STIRLING.—A concert of exceptional interest took place on January 23, when the Scottish Orchestra co-operated with the Stirling Choral Society in performing Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.' Under Mr. Senior's direction the choral singing was distinguished by its efficiency and expressive spirit, and the orchestral playing was of course on the highest level. The remainder of the programme consisted of orchestral music given under the direction of Mr. Emil Mlynarsky. It included Weber's 'Oberon' Overture, Liszt's 'Les Préludes,' Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer night's Dream' Scherzo, Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' Overture, and Jarnefeldt's 'Preludium.'

TONBRIDGE.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and 'Hiawatha's Departure' were performed by the Tonbridge Choral Society, on January 29, at a highly-successful concert under the conductorship of Mr. George J. Kimmins. The soloists were Miss Beryl Freeman, Miss Winifred Verney, Mr. Herbert Eisdell, and Mr. George Baker. The choir and orchestra numbered 130 performers. There was a crowded and enthusiastic audience.

TONYREFAIL.—The Male-Voice Choir, conducted by Mr. W. J. Lewis, organist and choirmaster at the Welsh Baptist Chapel, gave their annual concert on February 6 at the Calvinistic Methodist Chapel. Great enthusiasm was roused by the performance of 'Sardanapalus' (Mathieu Neumann), the baritone solo part of which was taken by Mr. Ivor Foster. A still higher artistic achievement was the singing of Schubert's 'Song of the spirits.' In the miscellaneous part of the programme, Miss Phyllis Archibald, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs, and Mr. Ivor Foster gave great pleasure to their audience.

TREDEGAR.—The heavy choral work involved in a performance of 'Judas Maccabæus' was successfully undertaken by Scion Philharmonic Society on February 5 and 6. The precision and significance of the singing testified to the efficiency of Mr. Evan Jones's conductorship. The solo parts were taken by Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. David Ellis, and Mr. David Davies.

TREHARRIS (GLAM.).—On Wednesday and Thursday, January 22 and 23, successful performances were given at the Public Hall of Wallace's 'Maritana,' in full character, and with full orchestral accompaniment, by the Brynhyfryd Choral Society. Mr. T. D. Edwards was the conductor. The principals were Miss Muriel Jones, Madame Devonald Edwards, Miss Gwen R. Williams, Mr. William Davies, Mr. B. Gregory Evans, Mr. Ben Date, Mr. W. J. Broome, Mr. John Bevan, and Mr. Tom Stephens. There were crowded houses, and the singing was of a high standard throughout. The Treharris Choral Society gave their fourth Annual Concert on February 13, when they performed Haydn's 'Creation' with excellent effect. The soloists were Madame Edith Gunter, Mr. Ted Smith, and Mr. David Hughes. The orchestra was under the leadership of Mr. Ben George, and the conductor was Mr. W. J. R. Davis.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—An excellent performance of 'Elijah' was given by the Tunbridge Wells Vocal Association, on February 12, under the direction of Mr. W. W. Starmer. A semi-professional orchestra of thirty-five, assisted at the organ by Mr. Percy Ramsey, supplied accompaniment, and the chief solos were given by Miss Alice Hare, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Julian Henry.

Foreign Notes.

AMX-LA-CHAPELLE.

Max Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style' and Donald Francis Tovey's 'Pianoforte concerto figured in the programme of the fourth Symphony Concert (conductor, Herr Fritz Busch). Mr. Tovey, who played the solo portions of his own work, was accorded a most cordial reception.

ANTWERP.

Camille Chevillard's Symphonic-poem 'Le Chêne et le Roseau' was performed under the composer's direction at the third of the Nouveaux Concerts. MUNICH.

Under the conductorship of Herr Schwickerath, Frederick Delius's 'Eine Messe des Lebens' was excellently performed by the Konzertgesellschaft für Chorgesang.—An interesting concert of the works of Hans Leo Hassler was given under the direction of Herr E. Wöhrle, to commemorate the three hundredth anniversary of the composer's birth.—Madame Amelie Klose recently performed Martucci's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor for the first time.—At the seventeenth Volkssymphonie concert, Hugo Kaun's Pianoforte concerto in E flat minor was played for the first time by Madame Celeste Chop-Groenewaldt.—Under the direction of Herr Bruno Walter, Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was given for the first time at the Residenztheater.—The following are the dates on which performances in connection with the Strauss-Wagner-Mozart Festival will take place: 'Der Ring des Nibelungen,' August 11 to 16, 25 to 30, and September 6 to 11; 'Tristan und Isolde,' August 9 and 21, September 2 and 14; 'Die Meistersinger,' August 18 and 23, September 4 and 16; 'Le Nozze di Figaro,' July 30, and August 4; 'Don Giovanni,' August 2 and 6; 'Die Zauberflöte,' July 31, and August 5; 'Ariadne auf Naxos,' August 8 and 20, September 1 and 13. (The full prospectus is obtainable from Messrs. Schulz-Curtius & Powell, 44, Regent Street, London.)

NANCY.

Among the interesting works heard lately at the Symphony Concerts (conductor, M. Guy Ropartz) have been Louis Thirion's Symphony in E flat, Mahler's fourth Symphony, and Gabriel Fauré's Suite 'Caligula.'

NANTES.

A new three-act opera, 'Sonia,' by Philippe Gaubert (libretto by M. Batillot), was successfully performed at the Grand Theatre on February 8.

PARIS.

M. Vincent D'Indy conducted the Lamoureux Concert given on January 11, when the Overture to Rameau's 'Zais,' the final scene from Lully's 'Arnède,' and the 'Jour d'été à la montagne,' by M. D'Indy himself, were excellently performed.—M. Paderewski has appeared twice with great success at the Conservatoire Concerts.—On January 29, M. André Gailhard's opera, 'Le Sortilège,' was produced at the Grand Opéra.—Debussy's 'Images' were played at the Colonne Concert given on January 26. One of the set, 'Gigues,' was produced on this occasion, and proved fully worthy of its composer.—Three new orchestral sketches by Theodore Dubois were produced at the Séchery Concert on February 2.—On February 9 M. Raoul Pugno introduced Mlle. Nadia Boulanger's 'Fantaisie' for pianoforte and orchestra at a Lamoureux Concert.

ROUEN.

A four-act opera, 'La Terre qui meurt,' composed by M. Marcel Bertrand to the libretto by M. René Bazin, has been produced at the Théâtre des Arts.

ST. PETERSBURG.

Elgar's Violin concerto, with Herr Fritz Kreisler as soloist, was performed with enormous success at the Kussewitzsky Concert on February 5.—At another concert of the same series Bruckner's ninth Symphony was played, under the direction of Herr Ernst Wendel, for the first time in Russia.

STUTTGART.

An interesting 'Sinfonia espansiva,' by the Danish composer Carl Nielsen, was played, under the composer's direction, for the first time in Germany at the seventh Symphony Concert of the Königliche Kapelle.

VIENNA.

An interesting new orchestral work, 'Carneval,' by Ferdinand Scherber, was successfully produced at a concert of the Tonkünstlerorchester.—Two works by Delius, 'Meerestreiben,' for solo-baritone, choir, and orchestra (to the poem by Walt Whitman), and the tone-poem 'Paris,' and Max Schillings's 'Hochzeitlied,' were performed at a concert of the Philharmonischer Chor (conductor, Herr Franz Schreker).—Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' (in the Paris version) was recently given for the first time at the Imperial Opera.—At the fourth Symphony Concert of the Musikverein, on January 28, the Misses May and Beatrice Harrison again performed the Brahms 'Double Concerto,' and upheld the high reputation they have already formed in Vienna.

Miscellaneous.

The following are the prize-winners in the competition recently organized by the Art Publication Society, Saint Louis, for pianoforte pieces: Giuseppe Ferrara (Louisiana), Victor Radeaglia (Turkey), and Louis Victor Saar (Ohio), $500 each; Cav. Paolo Chimeri (Italy), Louis Victor Saar (Ohio), Henning von Koss (Germany), $300 each; Josef Nesvera (Austria), Austin Conradi (Maryland), Carolus V. Agghazy (Hungary), $200 each. About three thousand manuscripts were sent in.

The Indian Music Journal for November-December, 1912, contains an article, entitled 'English Magnanimity,' in which the author (H. P. Krishna Rao, B.A., editor of the Journal) quotes the description of the Coleridge-Taylor Memorial Concert, given in the Musical Times for December, as an example of the activity of Westerns in art matters. He contrasts with this the apathy of Indians regarding their own composers and music.

The Piano-Player Review (3, Newhall Street, Birmingham), a monthly journal devoted to the art and industry of the mechanical piano-player, has reached its fifth issue (February). This contains articles by Bertram Smith, Sydney Grew, and Alfonso Hernandez-Cata (on Moussorgsky) and much occasional matter of interest. The price is sixpence.

The Music Club, which has recently been founded under the auspices of an influential committee, with Mr. Alfred Kalisch as chairman, held a brilliant inaugural meeting at the Grafton Galleries on January 27. The work of the Club is to consist of occasional meetings for social purposes, and the entertainment of foreign guests. The secretary is Mr. John Pointer, 19, Berners Street.

We are informed that an appeal has been entered by Messrs. John Brinsmead & Sons, Ltd., against the judgment of Mr. Justice Warrington in the case of John Brinsmead & Sons, Ltd., v. Edgar George Stanley Brinsmead (recently heard in the Chancery Division) so far as it concerns the defendant, Edgar George Stanley Brinsmead.

Mr. Acton Bond has been recently appointed a member of the staff of the Royal Academy of Music as Professor of Elocution and Diction, and also as Director of the Dramatic Class in succession to the late Mr. Richard Temple.

Signor Caruso has been engaged to sing at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, during this year's season of grand opera.

A series of lectures is proceeding at the L.C.C. Hackney Institute under the auspices of the Institute Musical Society. On January 25 the third lecture was given by Mr. Ernest Fowles, on the subject of 'Beethoven.'

Messrs. Stainer & Bell's new premises at 58, Berners Street, were formally opened on February 14 with a reception that was attended by many well-known musicians.

On February 10, at Caxton Hall, Mrs. Clifford Beckett inaugurated a series of five lectures on 'Song as an expression of life.'

Herr Felix Weingartner was recently married in New York to Mlle. Lucille Marcel, a Viennese prima donna.

There will be no Cardiff Festival this year, the Triennial Festival having been postponed till 1914.

Answers to Correspondents.

J. M. DUNCAN.—It is impossible to give a definite reply to your question. You ask 'If the composer of a tune has been dead for more than thirty years, and if the tune is still copyright, can the owner be compelled to give leave for its use, and how would the royalty be arranged?'

The first point to be disposed of is the duration of the original copyright. A composer may very well have been dead for thirty years without his work having fallen within the new conditions stated in our last number. Before the new conditions apply to the old work that work must have enjoyed its full period of copyright under the old Act, i.e., forty-two years. It is, therefore, material to ascertain not only whether the composer has been dead for thirty years, but also whether the copyright would have expired had the period of copyright not been altered by the new Act.

The second point is that the owner of the copyright is not 'compelled to give leave.' He has no option in the matter, provided the intending applicant conforms in all respects with the Board of Trade regulations, as regards notices and the purchase of adhesive stamps. These Regulations are to be obtained for one penny from Messrs. Wyman & Sons, Ltd., Fetter Lane, E.C. Ask for Statutory Rules and Orders, 1912, No. 532, Copyright.

It is impossible to say at present how 'the price at which he publishes a work' (Sec. 3 of the Copyright Act) can be settled, when the publisher prints that particular work in a book with dozens or hundreds of others. The Board of Trade will probably feel bound to issue new rules with regard to collective books, such as hymn-books, chant-books, anthologies, &c. In fact, the present rules are absolutely ridiculous as applied to such books; for, unless otherwise agreed, the copyright owner is compelled to provide adhesive stamps, and the intending printer or publisher is obliged to purchase a stamp for every copy. The result will inevitably be that it will cost the owners of the copyrights included in such books more time, money, and worry than their royalties are worth; on the other hand, such books when published are likely to resemble foreign stamp albums more than anything else. The Board of Trade Regulations require that 'the adhesive label supplied as aforesaid shall be an adhesive paper label, square in shape, the design to be entirely enclosed within a circle, and the size of the label not to be more than three-quarters of an inch in length.'

The hymn-books and chant-books of the future will be things to wonder at!

C. J. F.—They are not really grace notes, but makeshifts made necessary by Nature's short-sightedness in providing pianists with only two hands. Each is the bass note and therefore the most important in the chord. It should be played alone, the remaining superstructure of the chord being added as soon as possible afterwards, in one blow.

C. S. A. (K).—The songster's awakening' should be taken at about $\text{♩} = 66$, which is rather quick to waltz to. The best tempo for the recitative is that which suits you best, provided it does not drag. For the Allegro agitato in the 'Ballad of Meshullemeth' M. 120 would suit our taste.

FAMOUS COMPOSERS

AND STUDIES IN MUSICAL HISTORY.

First Payment 2s. 6d. only.

"FAMOUS Composers" is the first work to provide in a satisfactory form a presentation of the lives of all the great composers who have enriched the world with their gifts. The sublime compositions of the great musicians can never be fully appreciated or understood without a sympathetic knowledge of their lives, their times, and their temperaments. For that reason alone this work is indispensable to all real lovers of music, for in the pages of "Famous Composers" will be found biographies of all the great Immortals written by authorities possessing not only the literary skill, but also that spark of genius that lifts the work above the ordinary plane of critical analysis.

The Original Scores Reproduced.

Moreover the work is greatly enriched by the inclusion of examples of facsimile manuscripts of these great composers and their immortal works. Here will be found examples of the original score of Handel's "Messiah," Bach's Prelude to one of his massive Chorals, of Beethoven's tender Sonatas, Chopin's Prelude in D, the weird melodies of Dvorák, Haydn's original manuscript for the Austrian Hymn, Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," Mendelssohn's Melodies as they left the hand of the great composer, and a host of others; in short, never before has such a mass of rare and hitherto unpublished manuscripts been brought together within the compass of a single work. Among them are included facsimiles of music by Auber, Bach, Balfé, Beethoven, Bellini, Bizet, Boieldieu, Brahms, Bruch, Cherubini, Donizetti, Dvorák, Franz, Gade, Gluck, Gounod, Grétry, Grieg, Halévy, Handel, Haydn, Hérold, Liszt, Marschner, Massenet, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Mozart, Pergolesi, Purcell, Raff, Rameau, Rheinberger, Rossini, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Scarlatti, Schubert, Schumann, Sgambati, Spohr, Spontini, Strauss, Sullivan, Thomas, Tschalkowsky, Verdi, Wagner, Weber, &c.

CRITICISM.

In addition to the biographies, the work includes a scholarly criticism of the works of the great composers, its influence and bearing on the development of the particular school represented, and an analytical summary of the great works which have made their names famous. An immense amount of study and research among private papers and documents, original scores, letters and portraits, has shed new lights on their lives, and much that is interesting regarding their illustrious contemporaries.

REMARKABLE WORK

MUSIC EDUCATION.

WRITTEN BY FAMOUS EXPERTS.

THAT Wonderful Book, the MUSICAL EDUCATOR, seems this season to be entering upon a new lease of life. As our readers know, its aim is to supply in interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

PADEREWSKI,

"On the best way to study the Piano."

MARK HAMBOURG,

"The Piano and how to play it."

CARUSO,

"On the cultivation of the voice."

CLARA BUTT,

"On how to sing a song."

EDWIN H. LEMARE,

"The Art of Organ Playing."

MADAME MARCESI,

"The Teaching of Singing."

JOHN DUNN,

"On Playing the Violin."

SIR F. H. COWEN,

"The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE writes:

"The Musical Educator" is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent." Dr. CRÉSER, Mus.D. Oxon., F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

MARK HAMBOURG: "The touch is perfect, the singing quality almost human, and the action unsurpassed."

THE "ROYAL"
BRINSMEAD

Among the many distinctions defining the world-famous Brinsmead Piano is the preference it has won among Royalties. Both The King and Queen have "Brinsmeads" in the Royal Household; in addition, the Kings of Italy, Sweden, Bavaria, the Shah of Persia, Queen Alexandra, and many Foreign potentates possess these British pianos.

Though "Brinsmeads" vary in price, they are all identical so far as essential quality is concerned. Though the firm now produce a piano within the reach of the most moderate means, the trade-mark "John Brinsmead & Sons, London," on any instrument is a guarantee of those vital features which have won Royal favour.

Write to Dept. 32 for the New Brinsmead Catalogue, giving full details of the latest "Brinsmeads"; it will be sent, post free, together with the name and address of the local agent.

PAYMENT BY INSTALMENTS

A MANUAL OF PLAINSONG

FOR DIVINE SERVICE

CONTAINING

THE CANTICLES NOTED

THE PSALTER NOTED

TO GREGORIAN TONES

TOGETHER WITH THE LITANY AND RESPONSES

A NEW EDITION

PREPARED BY

H. B. BRIGGS AND W. H. FRERE

UNDER THE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENCE OF

JOHN STAINER

(Late President of the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society).

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plainsong, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

THE first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendixes to the Psalter; and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plainsong. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plainsong during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

TECHNIQUE

AND

IN

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY

JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—X.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

1. PASSION SERVICE

(Only published in Vocal Score)

FOR THE SEASON OF

LENT AND GOOD FRIDAY.

"The course of sacred events connected with the Passion is laid out so as to form a series of six distinct 'scenes.' The subjects of these divisions, each occupied with a particular stage of the Mystery, are respectively: 'The Traitor at the Table,' 'The Denial,' 'The Condemnation before Pilate,' 'The Mockery on Calvary,' 'The Shadow of Death,' and 'The Holy Sepulchre.' Mr. Gaul's work will undoubtedly greatly enhance his high reputation in the line of sacred composition."—Musical Standard.

"Scholarly writing, combined with unmistakable talent, and eminently adapted to the purpose for which it was written and composed. The work will probably be largely used, and Mr. Gaul has to be congratulated upon another success."—Sheffield Independent.

Arranged for a limited Orchestra—namely, Strings, 2 Flutes, 2 Clarinets, 2 Cornets, Bass Trombone or Euphonium, and Kettledrums.
Words 75. 6d. per 100.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

2. THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."

—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"The Cantata is replete with charming music of that school which everyone can appreciate, and which found so distinguished a master in Mendelssohn. If composers would have their works popular with choral societies, it is only reasonable to expect that they will bestow a fair share of their attention upon the choruses. The old masters knew this, and there is no doubt that the fact has much to do with the long continued popularity of their works; and there is equally little doubt, we think, that the principal cause of the failure of so many works produced nowadays is the uninteresting nature of the choruses. Compare the choruses of the three most popular works ever produced—'The Messiah,' 'Creation,' and 'Elijah'—with a large number of modern works, and our meaning will be clear. If we mistake not, such thoughts as these passed through Mr. Gaul's mind when he set himself to compose those works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins'; and that the public endorse his views is proved by the enormous sale which these works have had."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"Bow and Bromley Institute Choir.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."—The Musical Times.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

3. THE PRINCE OF PEACE

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . . Worthy the study of Choral Societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment."—Pontypridd Free Press.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

A
HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS
IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, The Royal College of Organists, and The College of Preceptors. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

MELODIOUS TECHNIQUE FOR THE PIANOFORTE

IN TWO BOOKS:
Price Two Shillings each.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

ENGLISH FOLK-DANCE SOCIETY.

FOLK-MUSIC COMPETITIONS.

Under the auspices of the Cirencester and District Branch of the English Folk-Dance Society, a series of folk-music competitions was commenced at Cirencester on January 23 and 24. The arrangements were in the hands of the general committee, of which Mrs. Bruce Swanwick, of Coates, is the honorary secretary. On the first day adults competed, and the second day was devoted to the children. The entries were satisfactory, but the attendance of the public was not good. Mr. Percy de Courcy Smale adjudicated. Many of the performers came from a long distance.

The awards were distributed by Miss Diana Cator.

Some of the chief results on the first day were as follows:

Pipe Playing. 'London Pride.'—1st, Miss James (Edgeworth); 2nd, Miss P. Bruton (Syde); 3rd, Miss Maitland (Brookthorpe).

Town female-voice choir. 'As I walked through the meadows.'—1st, Ciceter Girls' Club.

Open solo, female voices. 'Waly, waly.'—Miss James (Edgeworth).

Village mixed-voice choir. 'The keeper.'—North Cerney.

Village mixed-voice choir. 'Come, all you worthy.'—1st North Cerney.

Quartet (village), male voices. 'The jolly ploughboy.'—Filkins.

Village male-voice choir. 'The Chesapeake and Shannon.'—1st, North Cerney; 2nd, Filkins.

Village female-voice choir. 'The lark in the morn.'—1st, Syde; 2nd, Kelmscott.

On the children's day the awards were as follows:

Schools with average attendance of 300 or under. 'The Spanish ladies.'—1st, Cirencester Council School, Boys; 2nd, ditto, Girls.

Schools with average attendance of 150 and under. 'Green Broom.'—1st, North Cerney School.

BURY (LANCASHIRE).

January 30, 31 and February 1.

This event was once again a success. On the third day the classes were open and there was an audience of nearly 3,000 persons. The adjudicators were Professor Bantock, and Mr. S. H. Nicholson, of Manchester.

On the conclusion of the competition Professor Bantock said the movement was widely spreading. He hoped that they would be able to realise the enormous amount of good that Festivals did in their midst. They were raising the appreciation of music and were bringing refinement into a great many homes. He said that both he and Mr. Nicholson had judged the performances so that the choirs had had the advantage of being judged from two points of view. For example, Mr. Nicholson had regarded them from the North Pole, and he had looked at them from the South Pole, or at least from the Equator. Therefore they had not got a one-sided view. He said the performances of all the singers he had heard so far had been on a high level. It was a credit to Lancashire.

The results of the chief open competitions were as follows:

Bass solo (close), for bona-fide amateurs only.—1st, Peter Haworth, Crawshawbooth; 2nd, Clifton Maude, New Hey.

Soprano solo (open), for those who do not earn their living by music.—1st, Kate Sutcliffe, Todmorden; 2nd, Elsie Green, Barrowford.

Contralto solo (close), for bona-fide amateurs only.—1st, Alice Askinall, Whitefield; 2nd, Nellie Heywood, Unsworth.

Mixed-voice quartet (open).—1st, Colne Lyric Quartet; 2nd, Chilworth Quartet, Altrincham.

String quartet, two violins, viola, and violoncello (open).—1st, Harmonic String Quartet, Bolton.

Church and chapel choirs (open), for choirs of 20 to 30 voices.—1st, Altrincham Primitive Methodist Church Choir (conductor, Mr. J. A. Hill).

Male-voice choirs, T.T.B.B. (open), for choirs of not more than 30 voices which have never won in competition.—Haslingden Co-operative Vocal Union (conductor, Mr. J. L. Bryne).

Female-voice choirs (open), for choirs of not more than 36 voices.—1st, Blackpool Orpheus Ladies' Choir (conductor, Mr. Clifford Higgin); 2nd, Salford Vocal Society (conductor, Mr. Fred W. Blacow).

Instrumental trio, pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (open).—1st, The Whitworth Trio.

Male-voice choirs (open), for choirs of not more than 36 voices.—1st, Colne Orpheus Glee Union (conductor, Mr. L. Greenwood; 2nd, C.W.S. Male-Voice Choir, Manchester (conductor, Mr. Lewis Evans).

Choral-singing at sight.—Stretford Glee and Madrigal Society (conductor, Mr. T. Corlett).

Choirs of 30 to 60 voices (open).—1st, Sale and District Musical Society (conductor, Mr. Alfred Higson); 2nd, Hindley Glee Union (conductor, Mr. Joseph Layland).

THE BANGOR ROYAL NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD (1914).

At a meeting of the executive committee held at Bangor on February 7, Mr. T. R. Roberts, of Colwyn Bay, was appointed general-secretary. It was stated that £1,239 would be allotted to music, including the fees of adjudicators and cost of orchestra and choir for concerts. In the chief choral class £150 will be offered as a first prize and £30 as a second. As in these competitions the first and second winners are generally very close in merit, this disposition of the money seems strikingly out of due proportion. Inasmuch as the prizes are really grants in aid of expenses, it would be more equitable to distribute the £180 over three choirs, say, £80, £60, and £40.

HUDDERSFIELD.—February 7, 8.

The competitions organized in memory of Mrs. Sunderland were this year more successful than they have ever been before. The entries were as follows: Junior pianoforte, 41; senior pianoforte, 23; choirboys, 20; contralto solo, 33; tenor solo, 13; school choirs, 3; mixed-voice choirs, 7; and male-voice choirs, 6. The test-pieces and chief results were as follows:

CONTRALTOS.

Tests: 'Thou shalt bring them in' (Handel).
'My resting place' (Schubert).

- 1st. Hetty Sykes (Longwood).
2nd. Hilda Oldfield (Huddersfield).

There were many excellent voices in this class.

TENORS.

Tests: 'Love in her eyes' (Handel).
'O vision entrancing' (Goring Thomas).

- 1st. Harold Farrar (Halifax).
2nd. Norman Dransfield (Boothlines).

The standard in this class was not very high.

JUNIOR PIANOFORTE.

Tests: Waltzes in A minor. Op. 34, No. 2 (Chopin).
Rondo 'Sonata Pathétique' (Beethoven).

- 1st. Evelyn Graham (Lockwood).

SENIOR PIANOFORTE.

Tests: First movement, Sonata in F, Op. 54 (Beethoven).

Scherzo in C sharp minor, Op. 39 (Chopin).

- 1st. Robert France, Brighouse.
2nd. Arthur Wilkinson, Outlane.
3rd. Mabel Hynes, Scamonden.

This class brought forward some specially good talent. It was difficult to differentiate the three players named. The marks respectively were as follows: 146, 145, 144, out of a maximum of 160.

CHOIRBOYS.

Tests: 'The mermaid's song' (Haydn).
'Oh! had I Jubal's lyre' (Handel).

- 1st. George Jowett, Bradford.
2nd. H. Park, Moorhouse, Bingley.

Jowett gave a truly remarkable performance of the Handel air. He roused the vast audience to extraordinary enthusiasm.

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

Tests: 'Come, pretty wag' (Parry).
'The bells of St. Michael's tower' (Knyvett and Stewart).

Bingley Co-operative (Mr. T. H. Salter)
Stocksbridge Choral Union (Dr. W. M. Robertshaw)	...	...	...	68 66 = 134
Arncliffe Choral Society (Mr. H. H. Pickard)	...	...	...	72 73 = 145
Crosland Hill (Mr. A. England)	...	...	...	72 72 = 144
Bradford Vocal Union (Mr. J. Barker)	...	...	...	69 73 = 142
Crosland Moor Wesleyan (Mr. R. H. Dyson)	...	...	...	72 68 = 140
Ashton-under-Lyne Choral Society (Mr. R. W. Walker).

Five choirs were selected for the final test.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (Open).

Tests: 'O mariners' (S. Coleridge-Taylor).
'Hushed in death' (Henry Hiles).

Holme Valley Male-Voice (Mr. I. Silverwood)	...	...	...	76 73 = 149
Morley Vocal Union (Mr. S. Smith)	...	...	...	73 69 = 142
Todmorden Male-Voice (Mr. H. Lees)	...	...	...	74 72 = 146
Deane Valley Vocal Union (Mr. H. Dyson)
Heaton Male-Voice (Mr. C. Milne Rooks)
Greetland Vocal Union (Mr. E. Holroyd)

Three choirs were selected for the final test.

SCHOOL CHOIRS.

Tests: 'O, the summer' (S. Coleridge-Taylor).
'Cleansing fires' (F. H. Cowen).

- 1st. Lower Wortley C.S. (Mr. T. Morton).
2nd. Golcar, Grow Lane C.S. (Mr. C. Hellawell).

The competition is not taken up satisfactorily by the schools of the district. There were only three entries. The singing, however, was very good.

Dr. McNaught adjudicated, and conducted the combined choirs. Mr. J. W. Pearce was the official accompanist. The attendance of the public was excellent.

MACCLESFIELD (EAST CHESHIRE FESTIVAL).

February 14, 15.

This Festival is actively promoted by the Hon. Mrs. Serocold, daughter of Lord Sheffield, who resides near Macclesfield.

The prospectus states that the aim of the Festival is to encourage and promote choral singing, especially in the rural districts. It is hoped that by bringing competitors together once a year, the choirs and conductors will be stimulated and encouraged to greater efforts and higher achievements by the valuable remarks and criticisms of a competent and impartial judge.

There are no solo-singing classes, except for boys, and no instrumental classes, and there are no money-prizes. The appeal is entirely confined to East Cheshire. It is all very well organized, and there is an obvious pleasant spirit of co-operation between those who manage and those who are managed. Twenty-eight choirs of various constitutions entered. A few schools that had entered and prepared the music were unfortunately prevented from competing owing to illness of children. But all that came, both junior and senior, showed vocal capacity and an earnest desire to profit. Among the successes in the school classes there were the Prestbury school (Mr. Albert Loose), who gave excellent performances of two typically good school songs, 'The old brown house' (Hateley) and 'Will you walk a little faster' (Carroll and Macdonald). But the high-water mark on the junior day was reached by Lord Vernon's Girls' School (Miss Robinson) by their beautiful performance of two other good school songs, 'The three dragons' (Brown) and 'The coming of May' (Ethel Boyce). All the effects were secured through the music and not by altering its rhythm and phrasing, and the enunciation was remarkably good. Siddington (Mr. W. Webb) and Mill Street Higher Grade (Mr. John Owen) were also first-rate, and Ballington (Mr. A. Hulme) shone brightly in the sight-singing. In the adult classes the outstanding result was the fine performance of Sullivan's 'The long day closes' by the Talke Glee Singers (Mr. A. Bossons). Others who came first were Alderley Choral Class (Hon. Mrs. Stanley), the test being 'The shepherd' (Walford Davies); Edgeley (Mr. T. L. Ford), test, 'The Snow' (Elgar); Langley (Mr. A. W. Dale), in the Village Singing Class; Poyston Parish Church (Mr. J. White), in the Church Choir Class; and Edgeley Wesleyan (Mr. T. L. Ford) in the Open Choral Society Class. St. Peter's Church, Congleton (Mr. Fred Green) sang with fine tone and taste in another Church Choir Class, in which they were the only competitors.

An important feature of this Festival is the concert given by the combined adult choirs. The chief work selected for performance on this occasion was Bach's cantata, 'God so loved the world,' the choral parts of which had been made tests in the competition. Probably nothing that these village choirs could work at was likely to do them so much good as this fine specimen of Bach's majestic part-writing. It was found difficult at first, but as familiarity grew so did deep appreciation. The combined performance was impressive.

Miss Hilda Foster sang the well-known aria, 'My heart ever faithful,' which comes in the work, and Mr. William Coleman sang the bass aria. Later, both these soloists sang groups of songs to the entire satisfaction of the large audience assembled in the Drill Hall. Elgar's 'The Snow,' sung by the combined female-voice choirs, accompanied by orchestra, was one of the greatest successes of the concert, and was encored. The question of how to provide orchestral accompaniment at concerts of this kind presents difficulties. If a 'scratch' amateur team is organized it is almost impossible to weld it quickly into a unity, and on the other hand a professional band is costly. The solution adopted on this occasion was to have a few strings wholly professional, and those the best that could be obtained from the Manchester Hallé Band. The little orchestra consisted simply of two first violins, two seconds, two violas, two violoncellos, and one double-bass. They formed a perfect plastic unity that left no room for anxiety. Besides playing accompaniments they gave delightful performances of Handel's 'Water Music' and of Mozart's Serenade for Strings in G.

Dr. McNaught conducted, and he also adjudicated during the two days.

The Hon. Mrs. Serocold, and those who work with her, have every reason to be gratified at the result of their labours.

PEOPLE'S PALACE,
MILE END ROAD, EAST LONDON.
February 20, 22.

The children's competitions connected with this very useful and successful Festival are held at separate periods from those catering for adults. On February 20 only Jewish schools and choirs were heard, because they were unable to take part with the other schools whose only available time was Saturday, February 22. A band from the Baker Street, Stepney, School, under Mr. Davis, was the only entry in the children's violin band class. They played Schumann's 'Birthday March' (as arranged in Novello's School Band Music) with quite remarkable finish and spirit, and with excellent tune. Four schools had entered for the school choir section, in which the tests were 'Where the bee sucks' (Arne), and 'Waken not the sleeper' (Reinecke). Rochelle Street, Bethnal Green (Miss K. Darke), came out first.

On February 22 the great hall of the Palace presented an animated sight. Over one thousand children competed in various classes. Six girls' choirs were in one class, the first place in which was won by Eleanor Road, Hackney (Miss M. A. Wallington), the second by Sneed Road, Bow (Miss A. S. Hedley), and the third by Dingle Lane, Poplar (Miss Hants).

In the boys' section, in which only two of the three entries appeared, St. John's Road, Hoxton, was first, and in a mixed (girls and boys) class, Christ Church, Spitalfields (Mr. F. Daly), reached the highest point attained during the two days by their beautiful performance of 'O no, John' (folk-song) and the two-part song, 'In summer woods' (John Ireland). Rarely have such pure tone, perfect intonation, clear enunciation, and fine rhythmic treatment been heard at a junior competition. As was pointed out by the judge, all this artistic execution was secured without upsetting any factor of the composition. The laudable attempt at clear enunciation often made at these events is very apt to lead to a falsification of the phrasing and rhythm of the music.

Seven schools were tested in sight-reading, Christ Church, Spitalfields, coming out with flying colours.

Another highly promising section of the Festival was that for Children's Choirs, Bands of Hope, and Play Centres. No fewer than eleven choirs had entered, and they all appeared. The tests were 'My own country' (Forrester) and 'Riding to Fairyland' (Bantock). Grove Mission Sunday School Choir, Homerton (Mr. F. E. Creed), came first, St. Mary's, Stratford, Band of Hope (Rev. H. J. Kitcat) second, St. Simon Zelotes third, and Laburnum Street Play Centre, Haggerston, fourth. Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

A concert and prize-distribution followed. The choirs sang sometimes separately and sometimes combined, and there was an attractive exhibition of Morris dancing by girls from the Esperance Guild. Mrs. Humphry Ward distributed the prizes. She voiced her satisfaction with the whole proceedings, and particularly with the appearance of choirs from Play Centres, in the establishment of which she had been so intimately concerned.

Although the number of competitors is satisfactory, audiences are not drawn. It would seem still that parents regard the competition and concert as a thing apart from their interests.

Miss Edith Barran, the honorary secretary, displays exceptional skill in organizing this Festival. It has brought light to many dark quarters in the East, and it has revealed the existence of ample musical capacity on the part of the children and an almost touching devotion on the part of faithful and competent teachers.

The adult competitions will be held at the Palace on April 21, 25, 28, 29, May 2 and 3.

NAVAL AND MILITARY MUSICAL UNION.

The competitions this season will take place at Aldershot at the Smith-Dorrien Institute, Stanhope Lines, as follows: 'Smith-Dorrien' Cup, March 8, at 7.30 p.m.; 'John Farmer' Cup, April 9, at 7.30 p.m.

The songs chosen for the 'John Farmer' Competition are: Part-song, 'Soldiers' Chorus' (Gounod); unison song, 'The lass that loves a sailor.'

SCHUBERT'S 'SONG OF THE SPIRITS' AS A MALE-VOICE TEST-PIECE.

METRONOME RATE.

Schubert's 'Song of the Spirits' is one of the most imposing and beautiful of this composer's choral works, but it is not performed so often as its merits deserve it to be. It is accompanied. Welsh choirs would do well to add it to their repertoires. As there are no metronome marks printed, conductors may be naturally puzzled as to how to take the various movements. For their benefit we give the rates that were suggested some years ago when Sir Edward Elgar and Dr. McNaught adjudicated on this work at Morecambe. Adagio molto, quaver = 76; Più Andante, crotchet = 72. At 'Sheer from the low'ring crag,' crotchet = 74; Un poco più mosso, crotchet = 96. Più mosso (page 20), crotchet = 108. Tempo primo (page 23), quaver again = 76. The piece is published by Novello's in both notations.

At the Revue School Blackpool, Standard V. boys were being tested in English composition, and the subject announced was 'A country walk during a fall of snow.' Mr. Rigby remarks that 'Perhaps it is not surprising that a boy, living in a town which boasts of its Musical Festivals, should refer to those competitions in his writings; but what are we to say of his appreciation of them, or of his conception of the high standard of excellence they have reached, when he makes the following statement: "The snow was falling fast, and I was in the country. The hedges were covered with snow, and the sparrows were chirping away like a child that is in a choir trying to win a prize"?'

DON'T GIVE UP YOUR MUSIC BECAUSE YOU CANNOT PLAY AT SIGHT.

WHEN you cannot play readily at first sight you often feel like giving up your Music altogether. You fail to derive any real enjoyment from it. You are weary of the drudgery of practising for many hours each day without much improvement being experienced.

Yet it is not at all difficult to become a good sight player. Provided the practising be on right lines, three months' practice for a short time daily is amply sufficient to enable any student to play all his new Music at first sight. This is not mere theory, for hundreds of pianoforte students testify to the remarkable results obtained from a Course of Lessons in the

EHREMAYER SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE SIGHT-PLAYING.

Don't give up your Music. Write for free descriptive Booklet of the Ehremayer System.

THE BRINSMEAD

Among the many distinctions defining the world-famous Brinsmead Piano is the preference it has won among Royalties. Both The King and Queen have "Brinsmeads" in the Royal Household; in addition, the Kings of Italy, Sweden, Bavaria, the Shah of Persia, Queen Alexandra, and many Foreign potentates possess these British pianos.

Though "Brinsmeads" vary in price, they are all identical so far as essential quality is concerned. Though the firm now produce a piano within the reach of the most moderate means, the trade-mark "John Brinsmead & Sons, London," on any instrument is a guarantee of those vital features which have won universal favour.

Write to Dept. 32 for the New Brinsmead Catalogue, giving full details of the latest "Brinsmeads"; it will be sent, post free, together with the name and address of the local agent.

THE DANCE OF PRINCE PROSPERO

By JOSEF HOLBROOKE.

(FROM "THE MASQUE OF THE RED DEATH" BALLET).

The Daily Graphic says:—"Holbrooke's wonderful command of the orchestra has never been turned to better account than in this vivid 'Fantasy,' inspired by Poe's story."

The Star says:—"This dance is remarkable for orchestral treatment, weird and fascinating expression, surrieks of laughter and the death bell being heard through the frenzied gaiety."

The Daily Telegraph says:—"In this dance of Prince Prospero, there were several moments of great beauty."

The Daily Chronicle says:—"Weird, fantastic, and eminently fascinating, the music gives a splendid picture of a dance, inspired by terror, and the vivid scoring increases the pictorial effect intended."

1. JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

Words 7s. 6d. per 100.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

2. THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art music."

—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"The Cantata is replete with charming music of that school which everyone can appreciate, and which found so distinguished a master in Mendelssohn. If composers would have their works popular with choral societies, it is only reasonable to expect that they will bestow a fair share of their attention upon the choruses. The old masters knew this, and there is no doubt that the fact has much to do with the long continued popularity of their works; and there is equally little doubt, we think, that the principal cause of the failure of so many works produced nowadays is the uninteresting nature of the choruses. Compare the choruses of the three most popular works ever produced—'The Messiah,' 'Creation,' and 'Beija,'—with a large number of modern works, and our meaning will be clear. If we mistake not, such thoughts as these passed through Mr. Gaul's mind when he set himself to compose those works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins'; and that the public endorse his views is proved by the enormous sale which these works have had."—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was diagnosed of encore after another of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."

—The Musical Times.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. EIGHTH THOUSAND.

3. THE PRINCE OF PEACE

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . . Worthily the study of Choral Societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment."—Pontypool Free Press.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THE CHOIRBOY'S GUIDE TO THE CATHEDRAL PSALTER.

EDITED AND ARRANGED BY

ERNEST NEWTON, M.A.

This little book has been compiled mainly for the use of choirboys, and, therefore, nothing has been inserted but what is absolutely necessary for understanding the pointing of the Psalms as arranged in the Cathedral Psalter.

A certain amount of information has been given for the guidance of the Choirmaster, but the principal part of the book consists in the sets of exercises which have been arranged to lead the choirboys, step by step, through the various divisions of syllables that occur in the chanting of the Psalms.

After careful examination of the Cathedral Psalter, it has been found that there are exactly fifteen ways of dividing these syllables.

All the exercises have been taken from this Psalter. The author has thoroughly tested the advantages to be gained by the use of this methodical arrangement of the exercises, and is therefore in a position to say that by the use of them a very considerable amount of time can be saved in teaching choirboys to understand the pointing of the Psalms.

As the Recitation Notes are well within the compass of Alto, Tenor, and Bass voices, the book can be used with equal advantage by all members of a choir.

Price Ninepence.

A COLLECTION OF

Easy Melodious Pieces for the Organ,

EDITED AND ARRANGED BY

E. STANLEY ROPER,

MUS. BAC.

In Two Volumes, each rs. 6d.

In this Edition the Editor has kept before him the resources of a "two-manual" instrument only. While it is hoped, therefore, that the directions for registration may be found serviceable in such circumstances, it is recommended that on a larger instrument the items be made even more interesting. In such cases the choir and solo organs should be freely employed, and the registration suggested may then be regarded as supplying but a general idea of the composer's intentions.

Among the items contained are the following:—

SLUMBER SONG (Squire)	PLAINTÉ (Tellier)
BRIDAL SONG (Jensen)	PLAINS OF PEACE (Barnard)
TRÄUMEREI (Hubay)	ANGELUS (Borodine)
ANDANTE RELIGIOSO (Forster)	TOCCATA (Crawford)
ROMANESCA (Leoncavallo)	SOUVENIR (Von Wilml)

PREFACE.

The attention which of late years has been given to the valuable exercise of adding extreme parts to an inner part has induced the Author to add a new Section, comprising 41 additional Exercises, to Part II. of this work.

In conformity with the plan adopted in the other Sections, these additional Exercises have been—as far as possible—selected and adapted from Standard Compositions.

The whole book has also been carefully revised and corrected, and it is hoped that in its new form it will prove increasingly useful.

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

APRIL 1, 1913.

JOSEF HOLBROOKE.

London musical life would be different from what it is without Josef Holbrooke. He is the most amusing serious musician in our midst. In his compositions, as in the torrent of his literary outpourings, we are continually encountering the bizarre and unexpected. A good deal of his music has a weird, grim, and fearsome psychological basis. This tendency of his mind to dour subjects accounts for his fondness for the poems of Edgar Allan Poe. He has a characteristic style which includes an opulent and amazing, almost dazzling, variety of imaginativeness, yet bold, bad critics sometimes have had the temerity to hint that his music does not always accurately fit the situation, and that it is applied haphazard. It is also suggested that he does not employ those reserves of analytic criticism of his own music which he lavishes freely on that of other composers. But we cannot pretend in this article to give an adequate estimate of the powers and achievements of this fertile composer. We desire simply to give a sketch of his career and some account of his personality and his opinions, and to pay a tribute of respect to a remarkable man. He is what is called a 'character'; an idiom that conveys the idea that he is something out of the common and at least slightly eccentric. One very creditable feature of his outlook on the world of music is the generosity of his appreciation of the so-called young British 'school' (if there is one). He not only writes enthusiastically about his contemporaries, provided always that they are up-to-date, but he often brings forward their most hopelessly unpopular works at his concerts. It is true, however, that a perusal of his voluminous scattered writings (which are a liberal education in the application of epithets) induces a feeling that some of his swans are masquerading geese.

The programme book of the concerts he gives generally provides some light reading, chiefly consisting of scornful remarks on the attitude of the public to his music, and thus the severity of the effect of some of the music performed is often pleasantly mitigated. We give some quotations later. Although Josef Holbrooke has enjoyed exceptional advantages in having his music performed and in getting his music published, it is evident that his halo does not fit perfectly. But he girds chiefly at the public, although publishers, critics, and others with whom he comes in contact are considerably not forgotten. Does he take himself seriously? The answer is that on the whole he does, and it may be said that he has established his claim to be considered a force in British music.

Joseph* Holbrooke was born at Croydon on July 5, 1878. His father, a professor of music, was born at Bristol, but his family was associated with Neath. This Welsh extraction Holbrooke fil's believes accounts for his (Joseph's) well-known pugnacity. His mother was born of Scotch parents in Glasgow, but, says the son, 'She belonged to the wildest of the hills of Scotland.' She was a professional singer, and she died when Joseph was two years old. As to the paternal appreciation of the son's achievements Mr. Josef blandly observes that his father declares he does not understand his son's music, and 'does not believe that anyone else does.'

Mr. Holbrooke père was for many years a peripatetic pianist with entertainers such as Liston, Thurston, Hamilton, the great Vance, and others. In 1883 he came to London in order to form a teaching connection. When Joseph had reached the age of six his father gave him lessons on the pianoforte and violin. One gathers from the interesting description of these lessons given by the composer that these encounters were occasionally strenuous experiences for both parties, the father being sore in spirit and the son in body. Joseph now thinks that the stimulus he received on these Spartan occasions did him a world of good, and served to school him to endure criticism. After a year or two the boy made good progress with both instruments, and at nine years of age he composed music for home consumption. He was a member of a local church choir, and as he possessed a beautiful treble voice, ranging up to the high C, his services were in demand for solos. This experience of the compositions of the best masters increased his knowledge of, and fondness for, the art. When he was fifteen years of age, his father, recognising the budding talent of the boy, determined to give him a better chance than he himself had enjoyed, and with this view placed him in the Royal Academy of Music (1893). He became a pupil of Frederick Corder for composition and of the late Frederick Westlake for the pianoforte. But he does not consider that he achieved much by way of composition at this celebrated institution. This comparative failure arose no doubt from Mr. Holbrooke's peculiar temperamental disposition, which would lead him to chafe under constraint. It was a disappointment to him that none of his orchestral compositions were performed during the term of his studentship. Although he was a skilful pianist before he entered the Academy, he speaks highly of his indebtedness to Mr. Westlake. Amongst the students who were his contemporaries he recalls Robert Radford, Isabel Jay, Charles Macpherson, Christopher Wilson, Nevil Flux, Herbert Withers, Aldo Antonietti, Gertrude Peppercorn, Herbert Fryer, and W. H. Bell. His intercourse with students, however, was slight, owing to his natural diffidence. But he has since contrived to make up for this failing. When he was fourteen he assisted his father in teaching, and began to earn his living. After leaving the Academy he continued to compose, but under discouraging circumstances. While he was on a melancholy tour with a pantomime company (in which he was the 'band') he received a letter from the late August Manns asking him to call at the Crystal Palace. Lack of funds was an obstacle which was generously met by Manns, who also provided Holbrooke with a much-needed meal. A grateful recollection! The result of the interview was that on March 3, 1900, he had the good fortune to have his orchestral poem, 'The Raven,' produced at the Palace under the direction of Manns, to whom so many English composers owe a great debt.

* 'Josef' is a variation for professional use, but it is not always adopted. There is no authority for the alternative spelling 'Holbrook' given in Grove's Dictionary.

The following criticism appeared in the April, 1900, issue of the Musical Times:

... 'The Raven' is deficient in regard to balance of tone in orchestration. There are invariably two ways of creating a desired effect. The one is allied to beauty, the other to ugliness. Of late a preference has, in most instances, been shown for the latter, because the writers had not sufficient strength to seek the former without becoming sentimental and undramatic; but ugliness is bad art. Mr. Holbrooke shows that he can invent expressive melodies, can develop them in a musically and interesting manner; but his endeavours to support in his orchestration the supernatural in Edgar Poe's lugubrious poem, result, for the most part, in crudities and harsh sounds that seem to blaze forth their inability to combine with anything approaching an harmonious whole. Still the work in its entirety is one of decided promise, for it attests to the possession of lively imagination, invention, considerable knowledge, and resource.

From this time forward Holbrooke has been constantly before the musical public as a composer, a concert-giver, a musical journalist, using as caustic a pen as have critics of his music, and a critic of things in general and more especially of the great stupid British public that does not crowd to his concerts. His industry and output are phenomenal. His published compositions include fifty or more songs, as many pianoforte pieces, sixteen violin pieces, twelve clarinet (or viola) solos, ten works in the form of chamber music, some of which are very elaborate, thirteen orchestral works (three of which employ chorus), and six dramatic works, the latest of which are 'Dylan' and 'The Children of Don.'

The following are specimens of the literary lucubrations that appear in Mr. Holbrooke's programmes:

Mr. Josef Holbrooke steps forward somewhat adventurously with his 12th year of endeavour for some Modern English Music to an apathetic public, and hopes to receive as few blows as possible (with the usual financial loss) in return. That our composers rarely hear any of their songs, if they are in any way above the Ballad Concert standard, still holds good, so there is still reason for giving concerts which may have for their object the encouragement of native art. I do not mean students' art. It seems that a great deal of encouragement is going on in this direction with plenty of financial backing; with what result the future will reveal. Meanwhile the composer who has passed the stage of the 'very gifted young man,' with a fond professor to watch him, seems to be very little catered for, except by a solitary performance every year.

A CONFESSION.

It is with some confusion that I have received a communication from an 'enthusiast'—in answer to my peevish complaint that these modern songs, 'in which this deluded disciple informs me that he really should not advise me to despair (!), and further that he really fails to understand why these songs are not heard at beautiful and enthusiastic 'Ballad Concerts,' for, he says, they are quite good enough, in his opinion, to be included! After this, I fear all my efforts will be wasted! so, in a dour and bewildered state, I leave the contest for the present. While our good English musicians in power with fine orchestras and much money are pummeling, to their utmost ability, the down-trodden and unrecognised gifts (!) of Richard Strauss and his brethren abroad, we, in our small way, and where we can, try to lighten matters by writing out cheques and playing our own music to recalcitrant audiences! It is to be regretted that the Reger Pianoforte quintet announced for this concert was found so long and turgid that we had to put it aside, in case it met the sad fate of serious English music. We have found a place for more interesting native work, and saved Mr. Reger's reputation, which, with Mr. Strauss, is sacred in this country.—J. H.

[We give this extract just as it was printed in the programme of a Holbrooke Concert given at the Æolian Hall on February 28.]

The following quaintly-worded notice headed a recent programme:

If the music should interrupt any conversation it may be pointed out that there is a splendid room upstairs to continue it in.

It will be observed that it is not quite clear whether the music or the conversation is to be continued upstairs, but we think we know what is meant.

In the course of a recent interview we note with much concern that Mr. Holbrooke said:

What is wanted is the death by starvation of three or four English composers. Scarcely anything short of this will awaken the public to recognition of the way they are being treated. You can't expect men to write music for nothing; nor can you expect publishers to publish it when they know there is little possibility of its being heard more than once—if, indeed, one performance can be guaranteed. Yet this is what English artists have to contend with. Their work is not wanted at home. They have to waste their money and time in travelling to Germany or France in the heart-breaking endeavour to get their music heard abroad, and then when, by good fortune, they have managed to get a hearing in some second-rate German town, they have at last a chance of acceptance at home.

Does he contemplate a hunger strike? We note with gratitude his unexpected sympathetic reference to publishers.

Mr. Holbrooke has been fortunate in enjoying the generous support of Lord Howard de Walden, who, under the name 'T. E. Ellis,' has written the libretti of the two chief works of the composer, namely, the operas 'Dylan' and 'The Children of Don,' parts of a trilogy based upon Welsh traditions. The first-named work has not yet been performed, but extracts have been given in the concert-room. 'The Children of Don' was produced in a costly style during the Hammerstein régime at the London Opera House on June 15, 1912, under the direction of Arthur Nikisch. The opera elicited divers opinions, but the most hostile critics admitted that it contained many fine moments.

One of the most characteristic of his works, 'Queen Mab,' a poem for orchestra (with chorus, ad lib.), was performed recently by the Berlin Philharmonic Society. Nikisch, who conducted, wrote to the composer :

The performance of 'Queen Mab' was very good indeed. Not all the public liked it, but a great number, especially the musicians, liked it very much, and the event strengthened your reputation in Germany as a composer of high quality.

During the twelve years in which Holbrooke has given chamber concerts without any financial backing, he has introduced over a hundred works. The following are amongst the composers represented : Bantock, Bell, Boughton, Bowen, Davies, Delius, Dunhill, Elgar, Balfour Gardiner, Kessler, Mallinson, Cyril Scott, and Walthew.

The whole impression of the man and his music is that both are as fitful as the sky itself and as constantly interesting. His music is the spontaneous expression of his peculiar temperament ; it is enigmatic and full of surprises, 'quips and cranks and wreathed smiles,' and gives one the general impression that his talent is not yet fully controlled and balanced.

Are we to look on Josef Holbrooke as one of the saviours of our native art ? The answer to this question is in the lap of the gods ; but if tenacity of purpose and extraordinary industry, allied to remarkable ability, count, he will surely secure a niche in the British Pantheon.

MODERN MUSICAL CRITICISM: ESSAYS IN IMITATION.

By GERALD CUMBERLAND.

NO. 1.—THE 'CLEVER' STYLE.

The most famous maxim of La Rochefoucauld runs thus: 'Dans l'adversité de nos meilleurs amis nous trouvons toujours quelque-chose qui ne nous déplaît pas.' Sir Hiram MacDowell, Mus. Doc., whose new Choral Fantasia was performed last night for the first time, is not of the company 'de nos meilleurs amis': his simplicity of mind is too virginal for that. And yet, though no friend, his artistic failure has, paradoxically enough, given me pleasure. When will Sir Hiram learn that science is not inspiration, that learning is not invention, that the ability to write fugues does not necessarily include the capacity for expressing passion? And is it not time that we banished from our Art the pastoral pleasures of Herrick and the cap-and-gown simplicities of the academic mind? The Fantasia made a great impression upon the audience: an impression of dulness. It whipped them to enthusiastic silence. There was a great deal of activity and noise, but no music. One felt that the composer had tried to do his best and had miraculously achieved his worst. Truly, as some other wit has said, in the midst of life we are inept. There were in this new composition all the materials for a drink of whisky except the corkscrew. And so, naturally, I was bored. Also, a trifle disappointed, as one always must be when the most thorough search fails to reveal the whereabouts of . . .

But let us examine this work more closely. The poem upon which it is based is by Eliza Cook. It is ethical, not to say didactic, in tone, and it preaches very strenuously the housewifely virtues. It is useless to tell me that the work is entitled 'The Sin of Selina,' and that it is a kind of feminine 'Rake's Progress.' Eliza Cook knew as much of rakishness as Debussy does of bazaars; and her attempt to be lurid and highly-coloured is about as successful as that of Sir Hiram. Selina is bodied forth by a chromatic theme of eleven bars made up of one-bar phrases; this is sung repeatedly by the female voices in unison, until the tenors (who represent Temptation) enter on a pianissimo chord and begin a serenade of unimaginable propriety. Selina finds the tenors irresistible. She falls. It is at this point in the work that I find a passage of which I can heartily approve, for Sir Hiram is bold enough to be adventurously pictorial. There is a drop of a minor thirteenth in the female voices when Selina falls. Beethoven could not have done this. Nor could Bach. There is something in this modern spirit of Sir Hiram MacDowell that promises well for his past. But apart from this one touch of flashing genius ('soul-animating strains, alas! too few!'), the composition failed, as all composition must that is written by a man who knows nothing but his business. The composer conducted. He was called and recalled. He was still on the platform bowing two in a bar to the audience when I left the hall, grieved at the stupidity of a Philistine audience. Now, Schönberg . . .

NO. 2.—THE 'PICTURESQUE' STYLE.

During recent years music has been brought into the closest possible relationship with life, and now it has become possible to picture in sound the multifarious activities of our everyday existence. Sir Hiram MacDowell is the latest composer to paint in sound. He uses all imaginable colours, blending one hue with another with all the subtlety of a Whistler. And yet, in spite of this subtlety, he is a realist. His Choral Fantasia literally seethes with emotion. The tragic figure of the heroine walks through the score with pale cheeks and averted eyes. From the first bar she gains upon our sympathy. She is beautiful. She is young. She is hungry for life. Never, perhaps, in the whole history of composition has a human being been so finely limned in sound as Selina. She is, as it were, burned into the music, like a mordant acid. She lives—and, living, breathes. Can we say more?

But it is not in the portraiture alone that Sir Hiram has been so successful. What a wealth of incident there is, what dialogue, what wit and irony! And the atmosphere! Over the entire composition is thrown an iridescent web, glowing and palpitating like the heat of an August day. It is not like Debussy's 'L'Après-midi,' nor is it similar to Sibelius's 'Karelia' Suite; but it is very like the MS. of an unknown composer of genius I know, whose work will some day shake the world. For once, Sir Hiram has thrown off his British ancestry, and become what we would have him be. There can be no absolute music after this; its star has set, and the horizon of art is blazing with this new and purple comet. He has done with the chorus what no other composer has dreamed of doing before. The most luscious harmonies come into being, like shot silk, or (better still) like the phosphorescence that may be observed on Southern seas.

The performance was magnificent, but to our mind it would have been much more vivid if the hall had been in complete darkness. Light limits the imagination and destroys illusion. It curbs the fancy and kills it. Just as the pitch-blackness of night reveals the moon and stars, so might the darkness of the hall have disclosed to us the figure of Selina. But perhaps, after all, the composer was wise in refraining from such an innovation, for the vividness of the music even in the lighted hall was as much as the emotional audience could stand. Sir Hiram was recalled nine times. We felt so emotionally exhausted at the completion of the work, that we did not remain to hear the rest of the programme. It is a composition absolutely free from academic restrictions, and only a man of great and burning genius could have written it.

NO. 3.—THE SERIOUS AND REACTIONARY STYLE.

The metaphysical nature of music has never been disputed until recently, and it is significant that even now it is not the theorists—but composers themselves—who have begun to question what is, after all, an unassailable doctrine. But the experiments that have been made both here and on the Continent are merely symptoms of that social unrest and spiritual malaise that constitute the most threatening phenomena of our age. We are passing through a period of unbelief, a period in which every religious dogma is being challenged, and in which daring is accounted of more value than compliance with scientific and social law. Fortunately, Sir Hiram MacDowell does not range himself amongst the 'progressives'—on the contrary, he has written an elaborate composition with the evident intention of pouring ridicule upon that formless art which is in danger of becoming a public nuisance. The very title of his work is a proof of his contempt for the writers of programme-music. Until recently we had imagined that at least the concert-hall was free from the taint of life, that in it no breath of scandal could ever be breathed, and that our wives and our daughters could without risk attend any orchestral concert in the land. Music—as we knew it in our boyhood—was moral, interesting, and instructive; in these days it has become debased by association with the lower side of life. We need mention no names in this connection: our readers will understand well to what composers we are more particularly referring.

But by the composition of 'The Sin of Selina,' Sir Hiram MacDowell has done more towards the slaughter of the foul dragon than any other musician of our time. Absurd though the writers of programme-music are, they have become more absurd now that Sir Hiram has joined their ranks, for he has out-programmed them all. He is a defender of our Art, of our home-life—indeed, of our British Constitution. Nothing kills like ridicule, and we doubt if Richard Strauss will long survive this blow, at all events in this country. We have mentioned his name inadvertently, but, having done so, we let it stand. Not often do we admit it to our columns. But on a grave occasion like the present, it becomes necessary to call a spade a spade. Sir Hiram deserves the thanks of all who have young people in their care, for this exceedingly able attack on a school of composition that can bring nothing but disaster upon those on whom it casts its baleful influence, and we gratefully record our appreciation of all that he has done in the interests of Art, Morality, and The Home.

The conductor was recalled eleven times. The audience appeared to understand quite thoroughly his point of view. If the composition seemed to be taken quite seriously, that was, no doubt, because the gaiety of the occasion was fully recognised. There are times when laughter should be repressed. But the long-continued applause indicated only too clearly that the Great Heart of the British Public is still on the side of Truth and Morality.

NO. 4.—THE 'SAFE' AND POLITE.

There was, we think, a somewhat larger audience than usual at the Prince of Wales's Hall, last night, to hear the first performance of Sir Hiram MacDowell's Choral Fantasia. The more expensive seats, no doubt, did not contain so many people as the less expensive, but then, of course, this is usually the case. The rather dismal afternoon—though it cleared up later in the evening—was probably responsible for a few empty seats.

The pièce de résistance of the concert was heartily welcomed. Its title is 'The Sin of Selina,' and it is written for a large eight-part chorus with orchestral accompaniment. We regard it as a distinctly clever work, and, all things considered, we think it may rank as one of the composer's happiest efforts. It is better than his earlier work, and quite as good as much that he has written more recently. It is melodious and graceful, and the vocal writing is most learned and ingenious, as indeed might have been expected from a doctor of music. The work occupies twenty-two minutes in performance, and is divided into three comparatively short movements. The first is marked Allegro, and is, if the programme notes be correct, in the key of E flat minor; the second is an Andante in B flat major; and the final movement, a Scherzo, is (rather unexpectedly) in C sharp minor. The music, as we have already said, is melodious and graceful. Moreover, it is distinctly clever. We did not quite follow the programmatic scheme, but it is always difficult to do this in detail at the first hearing of a new work, and no doubt a study of the score will make all quite clear.

We are happy to be able to record that the work was enthusiastically received; and indeed it deserved to be, for, besides being melodious and graceful, it is distinctly clever. The composer-conductor was, we think, recalled fourteen times. The balance of the chorus was excellent. The sopranos sang really magnificently; so also did the contraltos, tenors, and basses. The orchestra was in fine form. Sir Hiram was visibly pleased with the reception his work obtained. No doubt it will be heard many times in the future. Sir Hiram, we may mention, is related on his mother's side to the Duke of Wigan, who is well known as an amateur violinist of distinction.

BRITISH COPYRIGHT IN CANADA.

AN INJUNCTION GRANTED TO RESTRAIN THE IMPORTATION INTO CANADA OF BRITISH COPYRIGHT MUSIC REPRINTED IN THE UNITED STATES.

A judgment of far-reaching consequences was delivered on February 14 ult. by the Honourable Mr. Justice Middleton in the High Court Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

The plaintiff was Mr. Oliver Hawkes, of the well-known London firm of Hawkes & Son, and the defendants were a prominent Toronto firm of music dealers and publishers. The complaint was that the defendants had infringed the plaintiff's copyright by importing into Canada an American reprint of one of the plaintiff's publications, which—although it enjoyed no copyright in the United States of America—was nevertheless protected in Canada by virtue of the provisions of the British Copyright Acts.

Under the British Copyright Law everything that is copyright in Great Britain is ipso facto copyright in Canada. It was therefore originally unlawful for anyone to import into Canada a foreign reprint of a work first published in Great Britain. But by a British Act passed in the year 1847, the British Colonies were enabled to import such foreign reprints on condition that they passed a local law designed to compensate the British proprietor of the copyright. Canada in 1850 duly passed such a law, fixing the duty to be levied on the imported copies at 12½ per cent. ad valorem for the benefit of the British owner, and by Orders in Council of December 12, 1847, and of July 7, 1868, the clauses in the British Acts against importation of foreign reprints were suspended as regards Canada.

In consequence of a clause in the British North America Act (1867), which conferred upon Canada the right to legislate in Canada on the subject of copyright, serious disputes arose between the Mother Country and the Colony as to the nature and extent of that right. The Canadian Government maintained that Canada was entitled to legislate for its own territory, even to the exclusion of the British Copyright Acts. Consequently Canada, having in 1875 passed a local Act which conferred Canadian copyright only on condition that the work was printed and published in Canada, claimed that unless British works were so printed and published, they lost all their rights in Canada, and that foreign reprints might be imported from the United States without restriction. The British contention had always been that the British North America Act had only enabled Canada to legislate for the copyright of works of Canadian origin, and that Canadian copyright legislation could have no effect on any British work first published outside Canada. The point was finally settled against Canada in the Canadian case of Smiles v. Belford.

More recently another attempt was made to get round the decision in Smiles v. Belford. There is a provision in the British Customs Consolidation Act of 1876 that the importation of foreign reprints into British Colonies can only be restrained when the Colonial Customs have been duly notified that a copyright, in any given case, exists. There is, however, an exception in the Act which renders such notification unnecessary in cases where a Colony has made entire provision for the management and regulation of its own Customs. In the important case of Adam & Charles Black v. The Imperial Book Company it was decided that Canada had made such a provision, and that consequently importations of British copyright works from the United States into Canada could be restrained without any previous notification to the Canadian Customs that a copyright existed. Eventually, in 1894, Canada passed a Customs Act under which she formally declined to collect the 12½ per cent. duty, which in 1850 she had undertaken to collect for the benefit of the British owner, but which in fact she had never troubled to collect.

The question then became a simple one. The British owner was no longer fettered by the British Act of 1847 and the Orders in Council thereunder; for Canada had repudiated her obligation to collect the duty. And the case of Adam & Charles Black v. The Imperial Book Company had decided that importation of reprints of British copyrights could be restrained without any notice to the Canadian Customs. The field was therefore thrown open for a test action such as that of Hawkes v. Whaley, Royce & Company. In that case the contention of the British copyright holder has been completely vindicated, and the decision is of such importance to all who are interested in the protection of British copyright property, that we print the Order of the Court in full, with the object of giving it additional publicity.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO.

HIGH COURT DIVISION.

THE HONOURABLE
MR. JUSTICE MIDDLETON.

Friday, the Fourteenth day of February, 1913.

BETWEEN :

Oliver Hawkes.

Plaintiff.

and

Whaley, Royce & Company, Limited,

Defendants.

Upon motion made unto this Court this day by counsel for the plaintiff in the presence of counsel for the defendants, and upon hearing read the Writ of Summons herein and the notice of motion served, and the affidavit of Frederick Harris filed in support of the motion, and the affidavit of Eri Whaley in answer, and upon hearing what was alleged and counsel for both parties consenting that this motion be turned into a motion for judgment and that judgment be entered as herein-after provided,

1. THIS COURT DOETH ORDER AND ADJUDGE that the defendants, their officers, servants and agents, be and they are hereby perpetually restrained until after the expiry of the plaintiff's copyright in and for the British Dominions now existing in the musical book or publication known as 'Otto Langey's Tutor for the Violin,' from printing or causing to be printed, or importing for sale or selling, publishing or exposing for sale or hire or causing to be sold, published or exposed for sale or hire, or from having in their possession for sale or hire without the consent of the plaintiff any copy or copies of reprints of the plaintiff's said publication published by one Carl Fischer of the City of New York in infringement of the plaintiff's said copyright, under the title of 'Otto Langey's New and Revised Edition of Celebrated Tutor to Violin,' or any other reprints or copies of plaintiff's said copyright.

2. AND THIS COURT DOTH FURTHER ORDER AND ADJUDGE that the defendants do pay to the plaintiff his costs of this action, including costs of this motion, forthwith after taxation thereof.

Judgment signed this 14th day of February, 1913.

Occasional Notes.

A Jubilee Festival, under the patronage of Her Most Gracious Majesty The Queen, will be held in London in June, 1913, to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the entry upon his musical career at the age of three of M. Camille Saint-Saëns, de l'Institut, Grand' Croix de la Légion d'Honneur, Mus. Doc., &c. On Monday afternoon, June 2, there will be an orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, Langham Place, when the Beecham Orchestra will perform, under the direction of Mr. Thomas Beecham, a selection from the works of the distinguished composer, and M. Saint-Saëns will play a Pianoforte concerto by Mozart, in addition to his Fantasia 'Africa' and other pieces from his own pen. Later in the same week a grand special performance of his operatic masterpiece 'Samson et Dalila' will be given at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, the date of which will be duly announced. The composer will be present on this occasion. The following is a list of the general committee up to date of our writing:

His Excellency The French Ambassador; The Duchess of Rutland; The Duchess of Sutherland; The Marchioness of Ripon; The Marchioness of Dufferin and Ava; The Earl Howe, G.C.V.O.; The Earl of Kilmorey, K.P.; The Earl of Londesborough; The Earl of Pembroke, G.C.V.O.; The Earl of Plymouth, C.B.; The Countess of Amherst; The Countess of Clarendon; The Countess of Lytton; Lady Charles Beresford; Lady Cowdray; Helen Countess of Radnor; The Countess of Kinnoull; The Viscount Churchill, G.C.V.O.; The Viscount Maitland; Muriel Viscountess Helmsley; The Lady Maud Warrender; The Lord Burnham, K.C.V.O.; Alfred de Rothschild, Esq., C.V.O.; Baron Frédéric d'Erlanger; Baroness d'Erlanger; The Hon. Harry Lawson, M.P.; The Hon. Mrs. Lawson; Sir Francis Champneys, Bt.; Sir Anderson Critchett, Bt., C.V.O.; Sir Carl Meyer, Bt.; Lady Meyer; Sir Edward J. Foynter, Bt., P.R.A.; Lady Cory; Lady Lister Kaye; Lady Mond; Lady Montgomery; Dowager Lady Lewis; Lady Paget; Sir C. Hubert H. Parry, Bt., C.V.O.; Sir George Alexander; Lady Alexander; Sir Frederick Clarke, C.V.O.; Sir George Beecham; Sir Vincent Caillard; Sir Ernest Cridge, M.A., F.S.A.; Sir Frederic H. Cowen; Sir Alexander C. Mackenzie; Sir George C. Martin, M.V.O.; Sir Gilbert Parker, M.P.; Sir Arthur W. Pinero; Sir Claude Phillips; Sir Charles V. Barclay Squire, Esq.; Monsieur Paul Villars; Albert Visetti, Esq.

The following additional names have been received:

The Hon. Lord Cullen; Lady Cunard; Sir Henry Wood; F. M. Dens, Esq.; Mrs. Alexander Maitland; Madame Melba; Prof. Niecks, Mus. Doc.; James R. Simpson, Esq.

This year is the centenary of the birth of George Alexander Macfarren, who died in 1887. In his day he was a force in British music, alike by talents as a teacher, musical theorist, historian, and as a composer. But he was not open to new developments of the art, and he remained to the end an adamant conservative. The oblivion that has been the fate of most of his achievements aptly illustrates the pace at which we have travelled in recent years. Yet many like the present writer will hold his memory in grateful recollection. The simple, touching anthem, 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' which was sung at the commemoration service held in Westminster Abbey on the day of his funeral, still keeps his memory green in 'quires and places where they sing'; and surely his oratorio, 'St. John the Baptist,' deserves the attention of choral societies.

The Committee of the Gloucester (Three Choirs) Festival have issued an analysis of the gross receipts and collections at the last six Festivals (1895-1910), which once more proves the superior drawing powers of the 'Messiah' and 'Elijah.' Whether a blessing or a bane, this superiority is an unassailable fact, and committees, especially Festival committees, can hardly be blamed for adhering to these works as their chief financial mainstay. Both 'Elijah' and 'The Messiah' are in the programme of the forthcoming Gloucester meeting, the one opening the Festival on September 9, and the other bringing it to an end on September 12. The programme also includes the following: 'The dream of Gerontius' (September 9, evening); the 'St. Matthew' Passion (September 10); M. Saint-Saëns's new work, 'The Promised Land,' a new work by Elgar, and Parry's 'Te Deum' (September 11, morning); Verdi's 'Requiem,' 'Israel in Egypt' (September 11, evening). Dr. Brewer will of course be conductor-in-chief.

The Leeds Triennial Musical Festival will take place on October 1, 2, 3, and 4 at the Leeds Town Hall. The following is an outline of the programme:

Wednesday morning, October 1.—Conductor, Sir Edward Elgar. Overture, 'Leonora,' No. 3 (Beethoven); 'Dream of Gerontius' (Elgar); Choral Work, 'Ode to Music' (Parry); Rhapsodie (Brahms); Symphony No. 3, in F (Brahms).

Wednesday evening.—Conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch. Choral work (new) 'On a May morning,' to be conducted by the composer, Dr. Basil Harwood; Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor (Tchaikovsky), solo pianist, Madame Thérèse Carreño; 'L'Apprenti Sorcier' (Dukas); Symphony No. 5, in E minor (Tchaikovsky).

Thursday morning.—Conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch. 'Requiem' (Verdi); Prelude for orchestra 'The cherry-tree' (Euterworth); 'Jesu, Priceless Treasure' (Bach), to be conducted by Dr. H. P. Allen; Symphony No. 7, in A (Beethoven).

Thursday evening.—Conductor, Sir Edward Elgar. Symphonic-poem, 'Dante and Beatrice' (Bantock); Prologue, 'Meistofele' (Boito); Symphonic-poem (new), 'Falstaff' (by Sir Edward Elgar); Choral work (new), 'The mystic trumpeter' (to be conducted by the composer, Mr. Hamilton Harty); Symphony in G minor (Mozart).

Friday morning.—Conductor, Dr. H. P. Allen. Mass in B minor (Bach).

Friday evening.—Conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch. Overture, 'Benvenuto Cellini' (Berlioz); 'Irish Rhapsody' No. 1 (Stanford); Violin concerto (Beethoven) (solo violin, M. Mischa Elman); 'Tailleur' (Strauss); 'Ein Heldenleben' (Strauss).

Saturday morning.—Conductor, Herr Arthur Nikisch. Wagner programme.

Saturday evening.—Conductor, Dr. H. P. Allen. 'Elijah' (Mendelssohn).

The grand opera season at Covent Garden will open with a Wagner series in celebration of the Centenary. Cycles of 'The Ring' will be given on April 22, 23, 25, 28; April 30, May 1, 3 and 6. 'Tristan and Isolde,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'Lohengrin' are also promised. A German opera, 'Oberst Chabert,' by W. von Waltershausen, and Ezio Camussi's Italian opera, 'La Du Barry,' will be given for the first time in England. Each has earned great popularity on the Continent. It is expected that Charpentier's 'Julien,' a sequel to 'Louise,' will be produced. During the first week of June 'Samson et Dalila' will be performed in honour of the composer, who is celebrating the seventy-fifth year of his musical career. A notable feature of the remainder of the repertory is the ousting of the old-style Italian operas in favour of such modern examples as 'Königskinder,' 'The jewels of the Madonna,' and 'Pelleas and Melisande.' Donizetti has at length been discarded, unwept.

Our Dublin correspondent writes as follows :

'The chief topic of conversation has been the action of some Roman Catholic clergy who object to the words of Bateson's madrigal, 'Camella fair,' one of the test-pieces in the chief choral competition (mixed choirs) at the forthcoming Feis Ceoil. These gentlemen—two of whom are members of the Feis Ceoil committee—have stated that unless the piece is changed it will prevent many choirs and solo competitors from entering for this year's competitions. The committee have refused to change the piece, and further developments are awaited with great interest. All the Dublin newspapers have given publicity to the matter. The words complained of are :

'Camella fair tript o'er the plain,
I followed quickly after :
Have overtaken her I would fain,
And kist her when I caught her.
'Hope being past her to obtain,
Camella loud I call :
She answered me with great disdain,
"I will not kiss at all."

An amazing objection, especially as the lady so prudently declines the osculation. What do the clergy dread if the words are sung in Madrigal Societies—that the tenors will rush in a body to the sopranos, and the basses to the altos, and demand satisfaction? Let us assure these good—or, shall we say, goody-goody?—people that this Madrigal and innumerable others that deal in a similar fashion with the various stages of the Grand Passion have been on the repertories of the best Madrigal Societies in England, and that nothing whatever has happened. If the objection is to stand, then consistency will demand that such beautiful poetry and fine music will have to be placed on the 'Index Expurgatorius.' 'Evil be to him who evil thinks.'

It is worthy of note that last year St. Thomas's School, Leipsic, celebrated the seven-hundredth anniversary of its foundation. It was once under the control of the monastery. In 1531 the Protestant magistracy took over the school, which was then much enlarged and improved. Two centuries later, when Bach was the Cantor, an extra story was built. The fabric remained unaltered till about thirty years ago, when it became the central office of the military chaplains, and the school migrated to the suburbs. The statue which four ladies erected to their teacher, J. Adam Hiller, was taken down, and built into a new door of St. Thomas's, which is now the Garrison Church. Bach's monument, put up by Mendelssohn, remains on the promenade ; in the square, just outside the church, is the great statue of Bach, unveiled in 1908. During the recent festivities much music by the Cantors of St. Thomas's was performed, including a 'Singspiel' by J. A. Hiller, and sacred music by Rhau (1520), Calvisius, Schein, Schelle, Kuhnau, Bach ('Dir, dir, Jehova' and the motet 'Singet dem Herrn'), Döles, Müller, Schicht, Weinlig (Wagner's teacher), Hauptmann, Richter, Rust, and the present Cantor, Gustav Schreck. The learned B. F. Richter published an important article on Bach's motets, showing that all were intended for funeral ceremonies.

THE BOURNEMOUTH MUNICIPAL ORCHESTRA.

BY CHARLES MACLEAN.

London music is centripetal and egoistic. A population of seven and a quarter millions lives in an area of 692 square miles ; but a seventh part of it crowds daily for its work into a single square mile, and demands its amusements within a contiguous area no larger. In the last ten years enormously increased locomotive facilities in metropolis and suburbs, and the appearance of numerous teashops and restaurants modifying English home life, have abetted that movement. Crowds are ever self-centred. This is the first reason for the quite extraordinary ignorance prevailing in London about Bournemouth music. A second reason is actual distance. Bournemouth is 108 miles from London, or two hours and odd by the best trains, and so beyond the reach of any ordinary day-return excursion-making. A tenth of that distance killed the Crystal Palace as a regular music-resort. A third reason is that Bournemouth has as yet only partially developed choral music, and viewed as advertisement that is far more potent than orchestral music. A fourth reason is that Bournemouth has only once held a large Musical Festival, viz., that from July 6 to 16, 1910 (see the report with group-illustration at page 526 of Musical Times for August, 1910) ; and this, though a brave show, was as an advertisement overshadowed by the Centenary Commemoration of the Town, of which it was only a segment. A fifth reason, and perhaps here the most noteworthy, is that London, with its satiety of more or less occasional concerts, is not in a position to correctly apprehend the technical and administrative bearings of the 'daily full orchestra' problem. That was the essence of the Crystal Palace music (1855-1901), and is the essence of the Bournemouth music (1893 to date) in each case, except for the overlap, a monopoly situation as regards the whole of England. Grove, strange to say, with a mind fixed on his favourite 'Saturday Concerts,' barely mentions the 'permanent band' which was the basis of the whole business (see Dictionary, 1880, s.v. Crystal Palace). The new edition (articles Godfrey, 1906, and Symphony Concerts, 1908) gives no better perspective. The ordinary reader of vol. iv., pp. 798, 799, however careful, must infer that Bournemouth stands for instance on much the same footing as Bradford with five and Leeds with ten occasional concerts a year. He would not in the least understand that the Bournemouth audience has first-rate eclectic orchestral music presented to it by a complete modern orchestra almost daily in the year, and more often than not twice daily ; that the best music has thus infiltrated the common life of the town ; and that the institution is the nearest approach to a complete German Hof-Kapelle as yet to be found in this country. A limited purview such as that in 'Grove' is almost like noticing the 'breaking-up' functions of a school, and ignoring the daily work of the term.

The present notes are by one who has had many opportunities of studying as well as enjoying the Bournemouth music, and aim at doing some justice to an ill-understood subject.

In 1810 Bournemouth, on Poole Bay, was a fishing village; it is now the second largest English watering-place; in 1911 its population was 78,677. Quick-growing firs and pines, planted originally for profit, have caused its salubrity. It was incorporated in November, 1890, and intelligent municipal government, with music for not the least of the agencies, has developed its popularity. In 1875 the 'Winter Gardens' were laid out and built; being ornamental grounds in a sheltered valley, with a sort of Crystal Palace at the head of the slope and an out-door band-stand for summer. In 1876 a small military band came at its own risk from Bath, and with local assistance stayed sixteen years. Trevisone, the present first horn, was one of that band. In 1893 Dan Godfrey, junior (as he then was), organized a Municipal military band of thirty for the 'season.' By the 'double-handed' method this developed into a small orchestra, string and wind, for indoor work at the Winter Gardens; and in 1895 an orchestra of thirty-three became 'permanent' throughout the year. On October 14, 1895, a series of forty Monday and Thursday special 'Symphony' Concerts was begun, with 16 strings and 17 wind (strings 6.4.2.2.2). These special concerts have been continued ever since; the orchestra gradually increasing to 55 (strings 8.6.4.4.4). In addition, there have been ordinary concerts daily on week-days (mostly two a day) all the year round except for a very brief summer-holiday, at the same strength. The Winter Gardens building is now the principal place in Bournemouth for general entertainment, of which the daily orchestra is the main feature. Dan Godfrey (b. 1868) is both conductor of the orchestra and general manager of the whole undertaking.

The finance of the Winter Gardens has been remarkably steady and satisfactory. In 1893 the Corporation assigned out of the year's income for special capital outlay thereon about £3,600, or what would have amounted if levied to a threepenny rate. Otherwise the venture has been almost self-supporting from year to year; and any small deficit arising must have been much more than repaid to the town indirectly by increase of attraction to visitors. No extra specific rate has ever been levied. The nucleus-orchestra of forty-seven, with conductor, costs about £150 a week. The salaries of the band are from 47s. 6d. to 95s. a week. The expenditure on Winter Gardens and allied institutions under the same management may be put roughly at from £15,000 to £20,000 per annum, including all extras. These figures however are not to be looked upon as a complete financial statement.

If emulation of 'Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts,' then much in the air, was the special incentive in 1893, that has long since ceased to be the predominant feature of the Bournemouth music. Rather, looked at broadly, is it an institution for entertaining the public daily with 'Promenade Concerts' of ever-increasing worth, interspersed with lighter entertainments, which however never in the slightest degree offend taste. There is certainly not a day when two or three first-class or interesting orchestral works cannot be heard. On the other hand there is no stiff policy tirée à quatre épingles, and the band will play even a 'rag-time' with great gusto. Why not? Ruskin very truly observes that 'the higher a man stands, the more the word vulgar appears unintelligible to him'; and there is a Dutch proverb, 'Daar vloog nooit vogel zoo hoog, of hij moet zijn kost op de aarde zoeken' (The highest-flying bird must come to ground for food). It must be remembered that Bournemouth population is insignificant compared with that of London. One in 5,000 can fill Queen's Hall; it takes as much as one in eighty to fill the Winter Gardens. So where London can apportion different audiences to different places, Bournemouth at its Winter Gardens must cater for all. However, really no apology is necessary, the entertainments being throughout admirable. The week-scheme, fairly constant, includes two classical afternoons, one classical evening, two popular evenings, and the rest according to method. Just as no soldier becomes such without recruit-drill, company-drill, battalion-drill, and the like; so here rehearsal (four mornings a week) is the main-spring of the machinery. Grove has remarked somewhere that it gave him a head-ache to think of Beethoven putting ff or crescendo on each line of his score; as if that was not the ABC of scoring. To conductors all over the world we are indebted for the modern perfecting of detail. What would quartet-parties achieve without incessant practice together? In reality it is not of so much importance what the orchestra does, as that they should do it all together. This lesson has been thoroughly learnt at Bournemouth under Dan Godfrey, who has adopted the highest standard of finish for his band, and has developed in his own self, strong emotional power as a conductor. The shallow platform hitherto in use at Bournemouth was bad for mutual hearing of the instruments, and this increased the necessity for frequent rehearsal under a conductor. The band can play almost every modern work; triple wood-wind, E flat clarinet, 3rd and 4th trumpets, 4th trombone, extra percussion, and so on, being got by extras from pier-band and theatre-band.

Some statistics for fifteen years down to May, 1910, were given on page 528 of Musical Times for August, 1910. It was there seen that Dan Godfrey must during that period have been at the conductor's desk 750 times yearly, and have conducted altogether 90,000 items. In the 910 special Symphony Concerts during that period there were played 1,263 separate works (apart of course from numberless repetitions), of which 267 were of symphonic rank. Out of the 1,263 works, 454, or over a third, were by 129 British composers. August Manns (1825-1907) in his forty-six years of winter Saturday concerts (1855-1901) had a justly earned reputation for assisting British composers, but he could show no proportion comparable to this last. The cost price of the orchestral library is about £3,000, and what with that and with music brought down, every nook and corner of orchestral music has been explored, so that the total repertoire is possibly the largest in the world. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, writing in 1907 to the local newspapers, referred to 'the extraordinary programme-record which these concerts hold,' and said 'there can be little worthy of notice in orchestral literature which has not been presented at some time or other.' Special programmes (e.g., overtures, rhapsodies, dances, evolution of this and that, national music by nations, &c.) have been frequent. In 1911 a choir of some 250 voices previously in private hands was placed by Dan Godfrey on a municipal footing as a Winter Gardens department, with Henry Holloway, formerly assistant-organist at Worcester Cathedral, as choir-master, and himself as conductor. Honorary, H. A. Kettle. Proper voice-trials, and weekly practices. Four concerts a year during the winter season. This is a very important development. So far, have been done 'Messiah,' 'Merrie England,' 'Elijah' (with a profit of £106), 'Hiawatha,' 'Golden Legend,' Gounod's 'Faust,' 'Tale of Old Japan,' 'Shon Maclean'. But the department is in its infancy. The miscellaneous entertainments above-mentioned have been very various; such as touring concert-parties, visits of star-performers, cinematograph, lectures, dances, Russian-Ballet, skating carnivals, &c. The Symphony Concerts have had their programme-annotators in Cuthbert Hawley, Walter Barnett, Duncan Hume, James Lewis, and Allan Biggs. They have developed local critics, who have turned out excellent criticism, in J. B. M. Camm, James Lewis (d. 1911), Hadley Watkins, Hamilton Law, and Allan Biggs.

Dan Godfrey has been allowed to carry out re-organizations of late. Five years back pitch was changed from high to low. The former had become intolerable. Mischa Elman broke three strings in a single concerto, and eventually had to take the leader's violin. London would not send down pianofortes. For purchase of new wind-instruments by men, the Corporation advanced the money, threw in a bonus of one-third cost, and took repayment of remainder weekly on the hire-system. A platform higher and ten feet deeper (at the expense of stalls) has been made for regular use. But the most important change has been the abolition last year of double-handed men with double duty, and the constitution of the military band of twenty-five for pier and parks as quite separate. Increased cost here has been mostly met by abolishing minor 'entertainers.' For impracticable yearly agreements have been substituted simple agreements with a month's notice on either side; which is better, though men trained here are constantly going to the larger orchestras in London, New York, &c. In the band may be specially mentioned: F. King-Hall (leader, soloist, deputy-conductor, composer), A. Holland (soloist, at leader's desk), E. Lifton Head (principal second), D. Gordon (second and deputy-conductor for military band), Montague Birch (second and pianoforte), A. Buckingham (second and librarian), M. Speelmann (principal viola), E. Batten (viola, composer), F. Dunworth (principal violoncello and pianoforte), Hendrik and Hein Wolters (violoncello), Handel Fawcett (principal double-bass), J. Gennin, F. W. Egerton, H. Oney, L. Chapman (principal wood-wind), A. Trevisone (1st horn), W. M. Pearce (1st trumpet), W. Byrne (timpani), Jacoba Wolters (harp). Henry Woodard, late of Eastbourne Devonshire Park, is assistant-manager. F. L. Parsons is secretary. Alderman Webber is in charge of the Winter Gardens, Pier, and Band Committee.

It is unnecessary to point out how much this venture, at present unique in England, owes to Dan Godfrey's strenuous and unremitting energy of the last twenty years, to his sterling character without which he could never have retained the necessary support of a punctilious corporate body, and to his artistic abilities which have brought him into line with the most forward musical movements of the day. A consciousness of successful merit will be his reward, and there is no need to multiply words. There are signs that Bournemouth will be copied, but it is not as yet. There are Municipal or Public Company orchestras at Bath, Blackpool, Brighton, Buxton, Harrogate, Llandudno, Margate, Scarborough, and Torquay; and a revival of Eastbourne is in prospect. But only Brighton and Torquay are 'permanent'; and none of these are, except on very special occasions, large enough to do the same work as at Bournemouth. The example has been set, and no doubt good men are and will be forthcoming; what is wanted in the immediate future is enlightened municipal enterprise.

Mr. M. Montague-Nathan is to deliver his lecture on 'Musical taste,' at Belfast on April 11, and at Liverpool on April 12, before the local sections of the Incorporated Society of Musicians.

THE RHYTHMIC WEAKNESS OF WAGNER.

BY ROBERT RALPH.

It is fairly safe to say that every composer worthy of the name has a weakness which reveals itself eventually to the greatest of all critics, Father Time. With the possible exception of Bach, who seems as invulnerable to the ravages of the hour-glass as the very granite itself, we can find in all the great masters little idiosyncrasies which we neither resent nor feel irritated about, but that nevertheless 'leap to the eyes.' Wagner's weakness undoubtedly lay in the staleness of his rhythmic formulæ. After the stringent measures of the Beethoven symphonies it is small wonder that the critics of Wagner's time objected to the latter's music. To a student of that period, who knew his 'fifth Symphony' well, the prelude to 'Lohengrin' or the 'Venusberg' music, must have seemed as boneless as a jellyfish. Doubtless much of the misunderstanding arose from the fact that the audiences of that day were peering for rhythms, and Wagner was giving them harmonies and polyphonies.

The reason why Mankind prefers music with a strong rhythm to the other variety, is probably purely physiological. The Solar scheme is apparently built upon rhythmic principles, and each part of that scheme has movements which, if regarded from a sufficiently high altitude of criticism, appear rhythmic in principle. With the ever-recurring pulses of our physical constitution is to be found the preference for rhythmic music. It is an added appeal.

To the majority of us rhythm is primarily concerned with the habit of dancing. If we reduce dancing to its fundamental cause it will scarcely be questioned that its function is to rid the body of a superfluous stock of energy. Rest is not necessarily absence of bodily motion. To cut a caper upon the greensward is as often as not 'rest' in its most complete meaning. 'Rest' is most easily understood as relief, and with an excessive stock of nervous force, the body becomes an irritating contingent of the brain. But violent exercise will effectually rid us of the 'stale, flat, and unprofitable' feeling. It is important to remember this elementary fact, as we shall see a little later on.

The love of musical rhythm is indubitably physical in essence, and is best appreciated during the pastime of dancing.

With regard to Wagner's notions upon the subject of rhythm, it may be said that the confusion surrounding the subject is no less than is usually found in his art-theories. He deals with Rhythm and Dancing in 'Art-work of the Future' in his customary dogmatic fashion. But it will clarify the vista somewhat if we frankly recognise the undeniable fact that the words 'Rhythm' and 'Dancing' meant very different things to Wagner, than to the rest of Humanity. We are warned by Mr. Ashton Ellis in his translation that 'It must be distinctly understood that by Dance, Wagner does not refer to the Ballet or anything approaching it; it is the grace of gesture and of motion which he sums up in this terse and comprehensive term.' In his anxiety to defend the giant from unkind criticism, Mr. Ellis has rather overstepped the mark. According to a reputable dictionary, 'to dance' is to 'leap or move with measured step to music; to leap and frisk about.' Therefore Mr. Ellis is perfectly correct in the first part of his footnote, when he says that Wagner does not refer to the Ballet, but we must protest against him calling Wagner's term 'terse and comprehensive.' The art of gesture and motion is the art of Pantomime. It surely has little to do with Dancing in our everyday sense of the term. How such a misconception on the part of Wagner can be called 'terse and comprehensive' is puzzling in the extreme.

The more one studies 'Art-work of the Future,' the more it seems thrust upon the reader that Wagner had no conception of 'Dance' as we know it. For instance, he says of Dance, Tone and Poetry, 'By their nature they are inseparable . . . for in this dance, which is the very cadence of Art itself, they are so wondrously closely interlaced with one another, of fairest love and inclination, so minutely bound up in each other's life of body and of spirit, that each of the three partners unlinked from the united chain . . . can only carry on an artificially inbreathed or borrowed life.'

We are not concerned here with Wagner's art-theories in general, so we pass on, merely remarking that Pantomime was undoubtedly in his mind when he wrote the above-quoted passage. For if not, we might be faced with the pretty problem of having to decide precisely how much 'leaping and frisking about' should accompany such a scene as Othello's address to the Senate. We find further evidence in such a sentence as 'the arts of Tone and Poetry become first understandable in that of Dance.' We need not grant him his point that 'Dance' had become coarsened and neglected until it nearly fulfilled the exigencies of the Ballet. The Ballet is Dance and Dance is the Ballet. Whenever Wagner speaks of the Trinity of arts, he always had Pantomime in his mind's eye as leading factor.

Now, if Wagner was lacking in one function, it was the capacity to dance, to 'hop and skip about.' The preternatural solemnity with which he took the Scheme of things was his outstanding characteristic. He was a man with a mission, and most certainly knew it. A review of his activities leads us to the conclusion that it was well-nigh impossible to conceive him 'relaxing' himself as most people do. He had no apparent desire or appreciation of letting his brain run wild. It is related of Mozart that when he and his wife were too poor to afford a fire, they warmed themselves by dancing furiously. Beethoven in his moments off duty would practise odd tricks which caused alarm to his neighbours. Brahms would do the same. But Wagner was easily the most solemn prophet that ever lived. His thought, though very deep and continuous, is slow, and at points almost tedious. If ever a man deserved to be called un homme sérieux, that man was Wagner.

Perhaps the best testimony we have to the heavy, lugubrious nature of his nervous system is the passage in the work cited where he reveals himself in one flash. He says, 'The savage . . . knows in his dance, almost no other change than that from monotonous tumult to monotonous and pathetic rest.' Here in one sentence we have Wagner's conception of what other people call 'Dancing.' To the savage, as to the rest of us, dancing is not monotonous, but a keen physical exhilaration.

We perhaps shall not be pushing our argument too far if we assert that Wagner had no notion of the pleasure thus derived, or he would never have penned the above statement. He could not have liked dancing as the savage does. It could have brought him no pleasurable sense-experience. Indeed, it is probable that he was not much addicted to physical exercise in any form. This must be firmly insisted upon if we are to regard his outlook upon Rhythm and Dancing as dependent on his normal nervous constitution. Rhythm and the Dance were not conceivable to him as such. He could only perceive their existence by association with music. If he had been able to grasp the physical rhythms derived from dancing, he would never have written the phrases 'monotonous tumult' and 'pathetic rest.' The tumult and rest derived from dancing are to most of us precious and glorious things. To him they did not become apparent unless connected with Music; he then comprehended them in a very second-hand kind of way. They were then only ghosts of the real thing.

To hear him speak of Rhythm as 'the conscious soul of those necessitated movements by which he strives instinctively to impart to others his own emotion,' is to realise how far he is wandering from a clear conception of what is in its essence a simple physical fact. That it was impossible for him to think of Rhythm as having in any way a separate elemental basis from Music is shown in the following quotation:

Rhythm . . . imparts to the dancer as the outward manifestation of . . . the Law of Measure, chiefly through the medium of that which is perceptible by the ear alone, namely Sound. Just as in Music the abstract measure of Rhythm, the 'Bar' is imparted by a motion cognizable only by the eye.

Later on he tells us gravely that Rhythm sprang from the Inner Necessity, but we need not dwell upon this phrase, for it would be interesting to find Wagner talking about something that did not spring from this precious Necessity.

We may sum up our review of 'Art-work of the Future' by saying once more that Wagner was no more cognizant of Rhythm apart from Music than he could conceive Poetry, Painting, or even Life itself. He was such a born musician that he resented the right of any art to dwell alone, and he upbraided by telling them that they had strayed from the fold. But whereas his lack of understanding of the sister arts did not affect his music, his unappreciation of Rhythm was more serious because it happens to be a vital part of Music.

It has been noted elsewhere that Wagner's use of a single rhythmic formula may be traced almost throughout his work, more particularly in the earlier work. In fact, he himself in later life remarked his slavish adherence to this measure. This particular rhythm is expressed in music as:

This persistent idiom, or a near variant of it, can be traced throughout all the earlier work and very much of the later. Examples may be found in the Prayer in 'Rienzi,' in the Grail music in 'Lohengrin,' the opening theme of the 'Meistersinger' overture, the Pilgrims' Chorus as it appears in common time at the Finale of the 'Tannhäuser' overture, the 'Kaisermarsch,' the chorale section of the Hall of Song chorus in 'Tannhäuser,' &c.

Wagner's best work is invariably done in triple time. With his weak rhythmic sense he must have originally conceived music as a nebulous mass of ever-changing tints. He thought harmonically rather than in terms of musical longitude. Probably his nervous constitution, with its prepossession to the sensual, was responsible for this. When he set out upon his first opera, 'Rienzi,' it would be necessary for him to acquire a strong, imposing rhythm of the Meyerbeer type. This would not be difficult to the mind that could memorise many of Beethoven's Symphonies. But although he grasped at many rhythms, he never assimilated them. Take for example the march theme in 'Rienzi.' It is undeniably strong, but heavy and dragging. The orchestra seems to be pulling slightly the whole time. Compare with the somewhat commonplace march in Rossini's 'William Tell,' and see the essential need of rhythm for a dancing mind to create it! The inability of Wagner's mind to hop and skip lightly is seen in the 'Dance of the Apprentices.' A convenient form to observe it is in the overture to the 'Meistersinger.' For exactly three and a-half bars Wagner does actually dance. On the third beat of the fourth bar he expires, and the dance is henceforth as dead as Marley's ghost. The perky semiquaver figure continues, but the rhythm, strong though it is for Wagner, is no more dancing music than is a Chopin Nocturne. To compare the 'Dance of the Apprentices' with the opening movement of the 'Rhenish Symphony' or the 'Faschingsschwank aus Wien,' is to see the difference between the inborn and the acquired.

Wagner was decidedly more chez lui in the sweet simplicity of three in a bar. In fact his finest moments are when he flows easily to triple time or the triple is so cunningly interwoven with the quadruple as to be indistinguishable, as in the 'Siegfried' Idyll or the Good Friday music. Here the rhythm seems utterly subservient and docile to the melodic curve or harmonic grouping. Perhaps a finer example of this perfection of Wagner's art could not be found than in the transition section in the Prelude to 'Parsifal' just previous to the final enunciation of the opening theme. Here the effect is well-nigh indescribable. The ever-changing harmonies appear to the brain as a gorgeous rainbow of which it becomes conscious through the unusual channels of the aural senses. It is a moment when one feels ashamed for ever having dared to criticise the composer. One loses Wagner the man in regarding Wagner the god. The passage is absolutely free from rhythm, and might be written with any time-signature. We have here the core of Wagner's art. Other near examples are the Good Friday music and the latter half of the 'Venusberg' music. In the Bacchanal scene most of us have noticed the cloying nature of the music. It is over-sensuous to a point where it loses its character, and despite the fine quality of the inspiration, the latter half of the 'Venusberg' music might be introduced into the sanctity of 'Parsifal' without alarming anyone who was ignorant of the detailed plan of the latter score. This arises from the fact that the 'Tannhäuser' excerpt has no strong rhythm such as a pagan orgy would seem to demand. Magnificent as are the strains of the 'Venusberg' music, they would sound even finer with a strong, strident rhythm. But we cannot blame Wagner for a physical defect. As the matter stands, once the bustling excitement of the Bacchanal has subsided, the music becomes merely sensuous—not with any specific quality, but an abstract virtue which would not be incongruous if hailing from Monsalvat or Valhalla.

The lack of rhythmic sense in Wagner is not so apparent to us to-day, because we have not quite accustomed our sight to the blinding incandescence of his genius. But it is safe to forecast that posterity will see the weakness more clearly than ourselves, for the reason that other composers whose sense of rhythm is strong, will only utilise Wagner's excellences. They will serve themselves plentifully of his harmonic and orchestrative effects, while possessing a congenial sense of rhythm. They will not be greater musicians than he, but they will be the heirs of the ages.

It has often been assumed by the unthinking admirers of Wagner that he had a mind which could wander among the several arts, picking and choosing the blooms of each, in order to weld them into the 'unified' art-form. This is to mistake the real type of cerebrum that he possessed. In regarding his mentality and art, one can work in either of two ways—by analysing from the operas to the cranium or vice-versa. If we proceed on the first line of thought we find a musical genius who has little appreciation of music per se: who only valued it as an adjunct to the 'perfect art-form.' On the other hand, if we reason from Wagner's brain to his operas, we find a mind whose capacity for sensuous musical sound is so enormous that it not only occupies the higher functions of the intellect, but overflows into the other divisions, even including the motoric nerve-centres. It is extremely probable that every action performed by his nervous equipment had in his years of maturity its accompanying musical idea.

Wagner told Liszt that for two years he had not composed one bar of music. We can only conceive an ardent prophet taking such a vacation, by assuming that his mind was so full of musical ideas that he had not the least doubt as to whether the Muse would respond when invoked. It is not too much to say that every sense-experience of his nerves had its sympathetic musical idea produced in his brain. We might say, for example, that if he had met with any violent accident, musical ideas would have been exhaled involuntarily in his mind by the excited nerves. In this respect he was as much an abnormality as the Siamese twins. If we accept the second hypothesis that we have tabulated, we find that his appreciation of sensuous full harmonies and rich tone-colour not only warped his view of Life, the other arts, &c., but even the normal conception of Music.

This leads us to the pretty question of his status as a composer of 'absolute' music. A few unthinking admirers have held the view that he could very well have written good Symphonies, Sonatas, &c., and the usual stock-in-trade of the absolute musician if he had been called upon to do so. This, one cannot help thinking, is to mistake the unique quality of his musical gift.

Without discussing the relative merits of the Opera and the Symphony, we may feel rather confident that the very qualities which made him readily grasp the idiom of operatic art would have effectually prevented his success in the architectural forms of music. The plastic quality of his musical thought, which ever made it long for affiliation to Poetry, Drama, Philosophy, or other support, would not form good material for building strong and self-sustaining organisms. His instrumental pieces are often written in the mildest binary or ternary form. (See, for example, the 'Tannhäuser' Overture, which is exactly cone-shaped, the 'Parsifal' Prelude, which is little more than a statement of themes, the 'Meistersinger' Prelude, with its three or four extracts from the opera, eventually driven as a team in counterpoint to each other.) The best effort in this direction is undoubtedly the 'Tristan' Prelude, where the variation-form reaches a height never perhaps attained before or since.

But the variation-form may be said to be the rock basis of Wagner's melodic system. It was the only organic form that he well understood, but within its limits he was an absolute master.

Wagner was no musician who saw the limits of absolute music. He was as constitutionally unable to write a good Symphony as Beethoven was to construct a remarkable opera. He was the exact antithesis of Beethoven in every respect. Often enough the latter master, notably in the first movement of the 'Pastoral Symphony' and the last page of the fifth Symphony, disregards the actual sounds and carries us along by sheer intensity of rhythm. On the other hand, Wagner, particularly in 'Tristan' and 'Parsifal,' allows the rhythmic beat to dwindle almost to extinction, while he floods our ears with luscious harmonies or rich instrumentation.

But if he was essentially a programmatist, his influence upon musical form has been colossal. No longer is the symphonist obliged to travel along the old, labelled lines of the text-book. He can introduce new effects, new climaxes, and modify existing forms, thanks to Wagner's genius for making us think furiously of the music that is being played at the moment. Of course the Symphony would have evolved further if even Wagner had not been born, but he hastened its perfection by many years. He made the bricks for other men to build with. One cannot remember the insistent rhythmic thuds in the fifth and ninth Symphonies of Beethoven without thinking that music had here just about as much rhythm as it could well contain. It was certainly saturated. What was required was a composer who would broaden the texture of music. This genius materialised in Wagner. That such a man should be born at such a time was in itself astounding; and the bitter struggle he had with musical critics arose no doubt to a large extent from the fact that he was a unit striving to turn the tide. That he conquered was after all as much due to the laws of action and reaction as to his own heroic efforts. Certainly, if no musician had such vindictive opponents, it is true that none has had such devoted and loyal supporters.

It was a favourite cry of the anti-Wagnerians that Wagner's music was degenerate, and we must grudgingly admit that to their mid-Victorian minds it would appear as if there were some little ground for their assertions. But it is surely preferable to have an interesting neuropath than a healthy dullard, and if these people had but looked a little more circumspectly into his art, they would have discovered that the heavy, sluggish rhythms were amply compensated for in other ways.

Physically Wagner was certainly a nervous degenerate of the Tolstoy or Oscar Wilde type, as his last illnesses would seem to testify. But this is no detriment to his art, for if Nature denies to her degenerates the grace of a healthy manhood, she certainly gives them abnormal brains.

OTTO JAHN.

BY JEFFREY PULVER.

It is curious and perhaps instructive to notice how frequently the study of the other arts and sciences preceded or synchronised with that of musical history, bibliography, and criticism in so many of the great musical writers. At the moment of writing there come to my mind the names of the historian Ambrose, Doctor of Laws and Crown Advocate; of Sir John Hawkins, the lawyer; of Ludwig von Köchel, the jurispudent, botanist, and mineralogist: practice at law seems to have been the vocation of many of those to whom music owes a very great debt. And to this list of lawyers and pedagogues we must add the name of a man whose work merits comparison not only with that of the greatest of musical biographers, but also with the finest examples of general literature—the writer whose 'Life of Mozart' stands unsurpassed in its historical accuracy and completeness,—a point it has in common with Spitta's 'Bach,'—and unequalled in its literary excellence: that name belongs to Otto Jahn.

Born at Kiel on June 16, 1813, Otto Jahn began his studies in his native place, building upon the foundation of learning laid there by courses at Leipsic and Berlin. Trained for archæology, and having taken his degree in 1831, he undertook journeys to Denmark, France, Switzerland, and Italy for study and research between 1836 and 1839. His first appointment was that of Professor in Philology at Kiel, obtained immediately after his return from Italy in 1839. Promotion soon followed, and he migrated to Greifswald (1842) to fill the Chair of Archæology there as Professor-Extraordinary. In 1845 his duties were added to and the title 'Ordentlicher Professor' conferred. Greifswald could certainly not hope to hold for long a man of such learning and potentialities, and a call to Leipsic in a like capacity followed in 1847. To the Professorship of Archæology the Directorate of the Archæological Museum at Leipsic was added, and these two offices he held until, during the strenuous times that began with the Revolution at Berlin, in 1848, his political views brought about his dismissal in 1851. This, however, did not prevent him from obtaining the direction of the University Art Museum, and that of the Philological Seminary at Bonn four years later. A call to Berlin in 1867 terminated his activity at Beethoven's birthplace; after a prolonged illness he died at Göttingen on September 9, 1869.

His literary activity, quite apart from his musical work, was enormous, and the catalogue of the British Museum contains over eighty entries referring to works dealing with the classics, philology, and archæology. But even if we consider none but those of his writings that are of interest to musicians, we shall be forced to the conclusion that these alone would amply fill the time of any ordinary worker; and going into the details of his musical researches, it is very easy to forget that he had many calls upon his time that emanated from any but musical sources.

His greatest and by far best-known musical work is, of course, the 'Life of Mozart.' Returning from the obsequies attending the removal of Mendelssohn's body from Leipsic to Berlin, on the afternoon of November 7, 1847, a conversation with his friend, Professor Gustav Hartenstein, first gave him the idea of collecting the necessary material for so epoch-making a work. How enthusiastically and how thoroughly he did this only the careful student of his last edition of 'W. A. Mozart' can know. The first volume was published by Breitkopf & Härtel in 1856, and contained the dedication to Hartenstein that gives us the information concerning the work's inception. The second volume appeared in the same year, and the third and fourth in 1858 and 1859 respectively. As a musical biography, it was the first to be treated on the system of comparative criticism, and as such it became the model for nearly all the works of a similar nature that followed. Combining a great capacity for systematic and scientific research with unusual perspicacity, Otto Jahn's account of Mozart's life is in itself no less valuable because of its completeness and accuracy, than is the history of the state of music during the period that preceded Mozart's advent by reason of the scholarly analysis that stamps this part of the great work as a unique example of musical literature. The great knowledge of his subject that Jahn possessed might seem likely to produce a work in which the portrait of the composer would be completely hidden under a mass of technical detail; but the very reverse is the case. The most vivid impression that is left after laying aside Jahn's work is one of a great musician living and working in his own natural environment, and thus the feature that has caused more than one of Jahn's critics to regret the over-abundance of detail extraneous to purely musical history is the very one that gives life and colour to the biographer's word-picture. Boswell, writing the 'Life of Dr. Johnson,' said: 'I remain firm and confident in my opinion that minute particulars are frequently characteristic when they relate to a distinguished man'; and just as those particulars make the portrait of Johnson stand out in bold relief from the mass of dates and figures, so do Jahn's anecdotes relating to Mozart's private life throw sidelights upon the composer's activity and, by illuminating the scene in which he worked, show us the environment and atmosphere in which his incomparable creations were conceived. And quite apart from its value to the musical historian, Jahn's work can make yet another claim upon the attention of the reading world: as a piece of writing pure and simple, the 'Life of Mozart' stands—the philologist Ritschl agrees—as one of the greatest literary achievements of the century.

But, as Calderon says, he who has never seen the sun thinks the moon bright, and if Jahn had not re-written his 'Life of Mozart' for the second edition, the first would have remained the shining light of musical journalism. As it was, he soon discovered that even his untiring industry had left trifles overlooked, and it was on that account that he wrote to Hartenstein in the Preface to the second 'completely re-constructed' edition, dated March 6, 1867, that he was delighted with the prospect of revising the entire work and of improving it by the addition of his since acquired material. Three points are worthy of notice in the Preface to the edition of 1867 (two volumes): the first is the intimation that the errors which had crept into the first edition had been corrected; the second is the information that Mozart's entire correspondence had given its substance to the amplification of the work; and the third point is an acknowledgment of the great assistance that Köchel's Catalogue, published in 1862, had been to the author. Jahn had, indeed, been going about with the idea of such a Thematic Catalogue, and would have commenced work upon it had he not learned that Köchel was at that moment engaged in collecting his material. Jahn thereupon, with true magnanimity, ceded all the information he possessed, and which was pertinent, to Köchel, with the result that the former could publish his second edition of 'W. A. Mozart' without the Catalogue, and state that a reference to Köchel would, in most cases, be sufficient to corroborate his statements. The friendship that existed between Mozart's biographer and his bibliographer was naturally of great service to the works of both, and we constantly find the one acknowledging the aid given by the other. It is therefore not surprising to find the 'Mozart Verzeichniss' dedicated to Jahn; nor are we astonished when Köchel says that it was only with difficulty that he gleaned some few new facts missed by Jahn, and he frankly admits wishing that the archaeologist's study had been less complete, so that he (Köchel) might have had the pleasure of discovering more himself. But it is with the true spirit of friendship, dignified by respect, that Köchel says: 'What name could better adorn the introduction to these pages [the Catalogue] than that of the man whose unsurpassed works on the immortal tone-poet this book is intended to supplement.'

The third edition of 'W. A. Mozart' appeared—vol. i. in 1889, vol. ii. in 1891—edited and furnished with some slight corrections and additions by Hermann Deiters. One of these additions is an interesting pointer to Scheurleer's work, 'Mozart's Verblif in Nederland' (The Hague, 1883), for extracts from which he is to be thanked. A reprint of the third edition followed in 1905-7.

This invaluable work was translated into English by Pauline D. Townsend, and published by Novello, Ewer & Co. in 1882. The Preface, written by Grove (February 23, 1882), gives a résumé of the author's sources, and draws attention to Jahn's predecessor in this field. With pardonable pride he mentions the fact that 'the first real attempt at a biography of a composer that should interest all classes was the work of an Englishman'—Edward Holmes (1845). But although both Grove and Jahn esteemed this early work very highly, the former is bound to concede that 'Jahn himself enjoyed higher advantages for his task than Holmes had done.' In one respect the English edition was rendered more valuable than the German editions were, and that was by the addition of a complete index. The fault of more than a few works of reference is the inaccessibility of their contents, and this fault was corrected by Pauline Townsend. A reprint followed in 1891.

Jahn contemplated similar works on Haydn and Beethoven, and indeed it was chiefly while prosecuting his researches to these ends that he found much that was useful to him in the work on Mozart. Death unfortunately prevented the execution of these plans, to the everlasting regret of the musical historian. The collected material, however, was handed over to men who used it to the best advantage, and C. F. Pohl's 'Haydn' and A. W. Thayer's 'Beethoven' are based upon what Jahn left to them. Pohl, it may be mentioned, was especially named by Jahn for the task.

Three essays particularly rich in bibliographical and biographical matter connected with Beethoven were written by Jahn: 'Leonore oder Fidelio?' prepared for the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung (1863, pp. 381 et seq.), dealing chiefly with the name that Beethoven gave to his only opera, and following the work through all its early performances, describes the various names given to it by different programme-makers; then follows a critical history of the opera. The second of the Beethoven essays was also published in the Allgemeine (1863, pp. 293 et seq.), and is called 'Beethoven im Malkasten' (Beethoven in the Paint-box). It owes its origin to an article in the Kölnische Zeitung, which describes a performance given by the 'Malkasten' in which the 'Pastoral Symphony' was illustrated by 'a series of movable living pictures, which showed the situations of the Symphony by pantomimic and pictorial means.' Jahn goes into the details of the advisability and utility (or otherwise) of such a procedure, and shows here, perhaps better than anywhere else, how impartial, broad-minded, and sympathetic a critic he could be. The third essay appeared in the Grenzboten (1864, pp. 271 et seq., 296 et seq., and 341 et seq.), and is a long article on 'Beethoven und die Ausgaben seiner Werke' (Beethoven and the editions of his works), a valuable essay dealing with the bibliography of Beethoven, and one that is in itself a lesson in the art of history-writing by the 'philological criticism' method. I have cited these three studies in the order in which they are given in the volume of collected essays—'Gesammelte Aufsätze über Musik von Otto Jahn' (Breitkopf & Härtel, 1867). To facilitate reference, I shall name the remaining essays as they succeed each other in this work. The first is an obituary article reprinted from the Kieler Wochenblatt (1841)—'Erinnerung an Georg Christian Apel,'—giving an account of the life and work of an (according to Jahn) excellent organist and composer of church music. The essay gives us some idea of Jahn's own tastes in music; for we may consider it established that what he praises in others is what he approves himself, and what he condemns is surely a fault of which he would not himself be guilty: admiring a healthy, virile tone in music, Jahn abhorred artificiality and striving after effect, disliking too great austerity as much as licence in the opposite direction. The second essay deals with Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' and is reprinted from Jahn's 'Ueber F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy's Oratorium Paulus,' which appeared as a 'Gelegenheitsschrift' (A writing for a particular occasion) in 1842 (Kiel). As an introduction to the subject treated, the author goes through a comparative history of the oratorio and the methods employed in this form of composition by the greatest composers of sacred music. Then follows a detailed account of Mendelssohn's work, and a more valuable analytical study of it could scarcely be imagined or wished for. Admittedly written to serve as explanatory guide to the performance of the oratorio in Kiel, this brochure is again the reflection of Jahn's own taste. He criticises comparatively the treatment of the subject, and praises the dramatic intensity of the work and the fitness of the music to the sense of the words. Very similar in treatment to this last-named essay was the one, 'Ueber Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy's Oratorium Elias' ('Elijah'), written for the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung (1848, pp. 113 et seq., and 137 et seq.). Jahn shows in his very opening words that he was a true admirer of Mendelssohn. Comparing 'Elijah' with 'St. Paul,' he says: "'St. Paul,' by its interpretation and treatment, marked a decided advance in sacred music, and greatly influenced similar endeavours of our own times. Those who expect that 'Elijah' should open yet another new region will be disappointed. Indeed, we are not justified in expecting it. But if we ask whether we see the master continuing in fresh and healthy vigour, with the same fine sense of the noble and the true, I can reply with a decided 'Yes.'" When I review this oratorio in its entirety, I cannot find any sign of deterioration.' Yet he sees weaknesses in the Mendelssohnian armour, and expresses himself in the words 'gewahren wir . . . allerdings auch die Schwächen seiner Manier' (we perceive the weaknesses of his style). Here, as in the other essays, there is much that belongs to the realms of musical history and aesthetics. The question as to whether an oratorio can be truly dramatic is gone into, and answered in the negative: 'The oratorio is not capable of a truly dramatic development. What one generally designates as dramatic representation is not that at all in the real sense of the words, but rather only characteristic representation.' Jahn, in spite of the fact that he 'found no deterioration' in 'Elijah,' is nevertheless far severer in his criticism than he was in the case of 'St. Paul'; and upon the aesthetic points on which he differed from the composer 'he sought to justify his divergent opinion.'

Two essays of a polemical nature on Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin' appeared in the Grenzboten (1853, I., pp. 327 et seq., and 1854, I., pp. 81 et seq. respectively). The first is a rather severe criticism of the poetry and the music, and their fitness to one another. To an extent the review is just, and Jahn, although very decided where literary purity is concerned, could be candid, unbiassed, and sympathetic. The 'Tannhäuser' essay is, in the first place, a psychological study of the hero; his moods and motives are discussed, and the appropriateness of the music used to convey these to the audience questioned. In the very long article on 'Lohengrin' Jahn is still more emphatically critical of the Wagnerian methods; but however much we may disagree with his views on Wagner's works to-day, we are forced to admire the purity of his artistic outlook and admit the truth of much that he says. Similarly controversial are the two essays contained in the Grenzboten for 1853 (IV., pp. 121 et seq., and IV., pp. 481 et seq.), entitled respectively 'Die Verdammnis des Faust von Hector Berlioz,' and 'Hector Berlioz in Leipzig.' What Jahn thought of Berlioz and his music is unmistakably shown in the sentences that open the later article: "'When I hear music by Mozart," says Hector Berlioz in the Journal des Débats, "I am obsessed by a little nightmare, and when I hear music by Haydn, I am always worried by a big nightmare." The indisposition felt by the hearers of the music of Berlioz has not yet received a name, but it cannot fail to put in an appearance.'

There are, in truth, moments in Berlioz that Jahn can find it possible to admire, but taken as a whole the paragraph quoted gives the right key to the impression that the Berlioz music left on the worshipper of Mozart and Haydn.

Two fine accounts of the thirty-third and thirty-fourth Lower Rhine Musical Festivals were printed in the Grenzboten for 1855 (III., pp. 1 et seq.) and 1856 (II., pp. 481 et seq.), the former containing a very eulogistic account of the vocal art of Jenny Goldschmidt-Lind. A short article used in the Allgemeine (1863, pp. 171 et seq.), entitled 'Mozart-Paralipomenon,' completes the collection of essays published by Breitkopf & Härtel in 1867. As its name suggests, this article deals with a matter generally overlooked—the experiences of Mozart and his pupil Frau Hofdemel, the details of which were communicated to Jahn by his friend Carl Czerny, who, by the way, afforded the former much assistance in the collection of the Beethoven data.

Jahn's activity as a musical editor was confined to the publication of a version for the pianoforte of 'Fidelio.' As a composer he is seen in thirty-two genial songs which were published by Breitkopf & Härtel. The true spirit of artistry that pervades these compositions shows how thorough a musician he was, and how well adapted to judge the music of others. It is a thousand pities that such a man should have died at the comparatively early age of fifty-six, leaving the musical world the poorer by the works he had contemplated, and which he was prevented by death from completing.

THEATRE MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

A tour of the theatres in that part of London known as the 'West End,' for the sole purpose of hearing the orchestras in the various establishments, would be found to be a very interesting occupation for the many musical people who believe that the theatre orchestra is a 'scratch' affair, and that the music played is of a 'cheap' type.

Very few theatres possess no orchestra, but there are two at the present time—the Kingsway and the Savoy. Mr. Granville Barker controls both of these 'houses,' and this brilliant man seems to have an objection to a band of music in the house of drama. Probably he thinks it foolish to spend money upon an orchestra that ninety per cent. of the audience do not appreciate—or, rather, show their appreciation by keeping up a continuous chattering during the whole time the music is being played. It is most deplorable that even in these days playgoers do not listen to the entr'acte music—which, more often than not, is quite good. However, it is to be hoped that one day the patrons of our theatres will realise that the orchestra is employed to play for their benefit and enjoyment.

At the theatres where musical comedy is the attraction, the band is, of course, part of the 'show' itself, and beyond saying that the orchestras as found at Daly's, the Gaiety, and the like houses are excellent, it is not proposed to dwell longer upon this particular class of band or music, as it is the orchestra and music, in the theatre where both are regarded as a 'side line,' that are to be dealt with here.

The orchestra at His Majesty's easily takes the first place among any of those of our theatres. This large combination is most ably conducted by Mr. Adolph Schmid, a very talented musician. Music always plays an important part in all of Sir Herbert Tree's magnificent productions, and many native composers have been commissioned at various times to write incidental music of quite a pretentious nature to plays presented at this famous house. Drury Lane can also boast of a first-rate orchestra, conducted by the popular 'Jimmy' Glover, and at Christmastide, when the annual pantomime is in full swing, the big band is heard at its best, and Mr. Glover is revealed in his element. He is a genius in the art of arranging music for his forces, and his overture, founded upon the popular light music of the year, is usually brimful of exceedingly smart burlesques upon the styles of famous composers. The Haymarket Theatre orchestra is a most admirable institution, directed by Mr. Norman O'Neill, the well-known composer and one of the prominent members of the younger school of British music. Here the band consists of wood-wind, trumpets, and strings, and is what may be called a Bach orchestra. The programmes presented consist chiefly of classical music, but music of our own day and nation is by no means neglected. Many managers would do well to copy the Haymarket in the matter of their band, which is so special a feature of this house. At the New Theatre we find one of the more usual type of theatre orchestra, consisting of wood-wind, strings, and pianoforte. Mr. Albert Cazabon, the musical director, has a capital repertoire of pieces quite suited to his small organization. He also includes violin solos at most performances, upon which instrument he is a capable player.

Some years back, Miss Lena Ashwell managed the Kingsway Theatre, and during the time of her control she endeavoured to give pleasure to her patrons by having a short concert of chamber-music before the play of the evening. An excellent string quartet and a pianist were the performers, and they were provided with places upon the stage. The experiment was, however, not very successful; the music played was too serious for the audience, and they did not appreciate it at all. No one seems to have followed Miss Ashwell's excellent example; but of course it is almost futile to expect anyone to do so.

So much for the theatres of drama; now the theatres of varieties command our attention.

Most of the music-halls in Central London possess splendid orchestras that play really good music. The most famous of them is that at the Palace Theatre, so skilfully conducted by Mr. Hermann Finck. It consists of between forty and fifty performers, and the ensemble is most beautiful. The Coliseum has a fine band, of about the same size as that at the Palace, conducted by Mr. Alfred Dove. An admirable performance of three numbers from Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' Suite was to be heard here a few weeks ago, but much of the fine detail of this music was lost in the huge auditorium. Certainly a larger orchestra could be employed here with advantage. Mr. Cuthbert Clarke directs a very efficient band at the Empire. Mr. Clarke is also a talented composer of the lighter kind of music, such as forms one of the ingredients of the ballets and revues for which this Leicester Square house is famous.

To those who have their eyes and ears open it must be realised that the orchestra is quite an important feature of the music-halls, but it could (and should) be made more so. The masses go to the 'halls' for recreation, and if it is impossible to educate them to appreciate real music in the ordinary way, we must do it through their recreation. Soon may it be when we shall have our music-hall orchestras playing classical music, such a performance being made a 'star' turn of the entertainment. The populace, as a whole, badly want to be trained to admire art in all its branches, and it is possible for the music-halls of to-day to do a great deal for the salvation of England in this respect.

In conclusion, it must be obvious that the orchestra in both the home of drama and the home of variety has great possibilities which in the latter place are being allowed to grow, while in the former they are severely stunted by the indifference shown by the playgoer,—who ought to know better.

WALTER WEAVER-YEOMANS.

Church and Organ Music.

AN EARLY METRICAL PSALTER.

By JAMES E. MATTHEW.

It is rather remarkable that while the curious little book 'Souter Liedekens' is known to musical bibliographers if only from its quaint title, no description of it is to be found either in Grove, or in the excellent 'Dictionary of Hymnology' of Dr. Julian. It has equally escaped notice in Eitner's useful Quellen Lexicon, nor is any English description of the work known to the present writer. Many interesting details will be found in Goovaerts' 'Typographie Musicale dans les Pays-Bas' (Antwerp, 1880), as well as in Vander Straeten's 'La Musique aux Pays-Bas' (Brussels, 1867), but it is to Dr. Scheurleer that we are indebted for the first exhaustive description. Although the work seems to have been received at once with enthusiasm, if we may judge from the number of editions through which it passed, and the length of time through which it retained its popularity, it is one of considerable rarity, especially in the earlier editions.

By the kindness of Mr. Alfred H. Littleton, the writer has been enabled to make a careful and leisurely examination of a perfect and excellent copy, which is in an enviable state of preservation.

The title of the work, which is in the Flemish language, is as follows:

Souter Liedekens Ghemaect ter eeren
Gods, | op alle die Psalmen vā David : tot
Stichtinghe | en een gheestelijcke
Vermakinghe von allen Christē Menschē
Coloss. int iij Capit. Leert ende
Vermaect u salven met psalmen eude
Lof saughden den Heere in uwer herten.
Gheprent Thantwerpen i' op die Lombaerde Veste tegen die gulden hant over, By my Symon
Cock, Anno M.CCCC eude XL den xij in Junio.

Cum gratia et Privilegio.

Which may be translated:

The Psalter set in little songs to the glory of God, of all the Psalms of David, for the edification and spiritual delight of all Christian men.

Coloss. chap. iii. Admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts.

Printed at Antwerp on the Lombard rampart, at the 'Sign of the Golden Hand,' by one Symon Cock in the year 1540, on the 12th June.

Symon Cock, the printer of the above volume, established himself at first in partnership with Gerard Nicolaus, or Claes, and afterwards, from the year 1530, carried on business alone. In 1539 he obtained from the Emperor Charles V. the privilege, for a period of six years, of printing works with musical notes. This privilege was granted on September 15. On the 28th of the same month he brought out his first book containing music, 'Een devoot en profityelck boeckken, inhondende veel gheestelijke Liedekens,' and this without doubt is the first musical work printed in the Netherlands. The book is one of exceptional rarity. A copy in the library of the late E. de Coussemaker, to whom all musical antiquaries are so deeply indebted, was sold for 520*fl.*, and would now probably fetch double that price. It is doubtful if any copy is to be found in this country, but we have to thank Dr. Scheurleer, of whom the writer has already spoken, for a reprint of the work, with elucidations, unfortunately in the Dutch language, with which one is hardly ashamed to confess unfamiliarity.

The date of this book is 1539, and it has been claimed for it, by Goovaerts and others, that it is an earlier and less complete edition of the 'Souter Liedekens.' That is not the case. It has this in common with the latter work, that it is an early example of a determination not to allow 'the devil to have all the good tunes.' It contains 259 hymns or sacred songs, arranged in groups under the heading of the music of the tune appropriate to the particular metre. 'The Psalms appear to have no place in the work, and although most of the music is secular in origin, some recognised sacred melodies, such as 'Pange lingua,' find a place.

It will have been noticed that while the privilege is granted on September 15, the book was produced on the 28th of the same month, i.e., only thirteen days later. This was obviously not sufficient time in those days to set up and pass through the press a book of this size, especially when it is remembered that in the use of music type the office had its experience to learn; and moreover the only method of printing then known involved the necessity of passing the whole work twice through the press. One may fairly suppose, therefore, that Cock was sufficiently certain of his position to justify him in getting the work well in hand while the negotiation was in progress. However this may have been, on June 12 of the following year he was ready with his second musical venture, when the subject of this article, 'Souter Liedekens'—The Psalter in little songs—appeared.

In the first place I will describe the little volume, which I do from Mr. Littleton's copy now before me. In size it is a small 8vo, 6½ by 4½ inches, and although re-bound, it is scarcely at all cut down. It is neither paged nor folioed, but the sheets, including the title, have signatures A to Z = 23 sheets, or 368 pages. Gothic letter is used throughout, and it is printed in red and black, the former of an excellent colour, which is used for the headings of each page and of each psalm, as well as for the staves of the musical examples, upon which the notes are printed in black. This of course involves two printings, for at that time, and for long after, no method had been contrived to overcome this necessity. It is a five-line staff, measuring ⅝th inch in depth; it will be seen, therefore, how small an error in 'registering' would effect a transposition, or at least create a fatal uncertainty, but I have been unable to detect any case of such difficulty. It would have been supposed that the setting of the staff would have been from a building up of 'printer's rule,' but this is not the case. It is composed of a series of blocks comprising the five lines, each ⅞th inch in length, joining so admirably that the break is scarcely discernible. Both the C and the G clefs are used, changing their position on the staff in order to retain the melody within it, and to avoid the use of ledger lines. It is the melody alone which is noted. The workmanship throughout is really excellent, and reflects the highest credit on Symon Cock and his assistants.

We now come to the contents of the book. The title, which has already been given, is printed in red and black, and is decorated with a wood block, somewhat rude in execution, representing King David seated, playing on his harp, with three men at a short distance, possibly joining in the music. The title is followed by a 'prologue' or address of a religious character, and this is succeeded by a register of the names of the tunes and the Psalms to which they are adapted. This brings us to the principal contents of the work, which comprises the whole of the 150 Psalms in a metrical version in the Flemish language, each Psalm being preceded by its appropriate tune, the words of the first verse being printed immediately beneath the musical setting. The metrical version occupies the left side of the page, while to the right, in a smaller type, are added the words in the Latin of the Vulgate. In addition to the Psalms will be found metrical versions of certain passages of scripture, comprising Isaiah xii., The Thanksgiving of Hezekiah (Is. xxxviii.), The Song of Hannah (Samuel i.), The Song of Moses and the Children of Israel (Exodus xv.), The Prayer of Habakkuk (Hab. iii.), The Song of Moses (The horse and his rider) (Deut. xxiii.), The Song of the three Children (Benedictus), (Daniel iii., Apocrypha), the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Luke i. and ii.), together with the Lord's Prayer, Ave Maria, Apostles' Creed, and the Te Deum. Of these the Latin version is always given. A large proportion of the music is adapted to the popular songs of the day, the titles of which are in every case placed at the head of each Psalm, and are included in the table of which we have already spoken, with a reference to the number of the Psalms with which they will be found united. This table, which is printed in double columns, occupies eight of these columns, which I estimate to comprise about 165 tunes, several being assigned to Psalm cxviii. of the Vulgate, which is cxix. of our version. Most of these tunes are undoubtedly secular—for instance, we have melodies entitled 'Venus,' 'Juno,' 'Pallas,' while some few are French, for instance, 'D'ou vien cela,' 'J'ai mon mon cuer,' 'L'amour de moy,' and the still familiar 'Sur le pont d'Avignon.' On the other hand there are a few recognised church melodies, such as 'Conditor alme syderum.'

The first question one asks is, To whom were the inhabitants of the Netherlands indebted for this enormous output of verse?—for a translation of the whole of the Psalms is no light undertaking. Here the book itself gives us no clue whatever. M. Goovaerts states definitely that the author was Willem van Zuylen van Nieuvelt, as does also Dr. Scheurleer, but neither unfortunately gives us any authority whatever for the assertion, while Dr. Edmund Gosse, in his article on Dutch literature in the last edition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' states that it is was 'dedicated to Willem van Zuylen, a Dutch nobleman by whose name it is generally known.' About the latter statement I am something more than in doubt, and certainly no trace of a dedication is to be found in the copy before us. I must admit that I am quite at a loss for any further clue for information on the point. As to the compiler of the music, Dr. Scheurleer suggests that it may have been Willem von Zuylen or even Symon Cock himself, but this appears to be but guesswork.

Symon Cock's Privilege for printing music was, as we have seen, granted on September 15, 1539, and it was registered in the 'Octroye' of His Majesty at Brussels on the 17th of the same month. The poet's labours must have been completed soon after that date, for on June 12 of the following year (1540) the printer was ready with his book complete. Its success appears to have been immediate. Edition succeeded edition with a rapidity truly remarkable. No less than nine with the imprint of Symon Cock have been catalogued by the very careful and accurate

Dr. Scheurleer, all of them distinguished by distinct but often minute variations both of the title and the text, but in every case sufficient to warrant the bibliographer in claiming each as a separate edition. But now comes the puzzle: each of these editions bears the same date, not merely the year 1540, but also the same actual day of the year—June 12! This is obviously impossible, and it is difficult to suggest any reason for such a course. It is not necessary to assume that the whole of the book was set up afresh for each edition, but the discrepancies are in many cases very remarkable. One example, for instance, is at hand. M. Goovaerts gives a photographic reproduction of the music to Psalm xxvi., occupying a single page. In Mr. Littleton's copy four lines occupy the lower part of leaf D 6 recto, the remainder the top of D 6 verso; while in addition to trifling differences in setting up the music, the Latin words are distinctly different both in setting up and in the relative positions they occupy. It should be mentioned that Dr. Scheurleer gives admirable photographic facsimiles in red and black of all the titles, the first four of which have certain small marks introduced, apparently for purposes of trade identification. There can be but little doubt that the order in which he has arranged them is correct. As stated, the title bears a wood-cut of King David. In title No. 2, the block already shows signs of a crack, and this develops rapidly in subsequent examples, till in No. 9 it extends entirely across the block. It seems absolutely impossible that the whole of these nine editions can have been called for in the year 1540, but it is difficult to suggest any reason to justify this seeming falsification of date, unless it was with the idea of claiming the protection of the Privilege when it had already come to an end.

This six years' Privilege expired in 1545. In that year there are somewhat hazy traces of an edition by another printer, which Dr. Scheurleer has not succeeded in running to earth, while in 1550 another seems to have appeared at Campen, also not seen by Dr. Scheurleer. In 1556-57 we break entirely fresh ground. The original work contained the melodies only. At that time the Flemish musician well known under the curious name of 'Clemens non papa,' issued a series of collections of sacred music by various composers, published at Antwerp by Tielman Susato. Among them was a selection from 'Souter Liedekens,' arranged for three voices, in separate parts, oblong 8vo. It may be added that a modern reprint of these may be found, in score, in vol. xi. of Commer's 'Collectio Operum Musicorum Batavorum.'

No good purpose would be served by giving details of all the editions subsequently printed, the last, which was the thirty-third, dating from Utrecht in the year 1613; but it should be pointed out that in 1559 Symon Cock re-issued it with a new block for the title. This is the fourteenth edition, and it was his last, as he died in August, 1562. The business seems to have been continued by his heirs, but however this may have been, in 1564 one Claes van den Woumere issued, also in Antwerp, a reprint, presenting on the title the original cracked block! Were the heirs sufficiently careless of Cock's reputation to allow it to come into the market instead of throwing it into the fire, or was Claes a workman of Cock's who had availed himself of his opportunities to 'convey' the block? This was the only work with musical notes which issued from his office, for in the following year he abandoned printing for the trade of bookbinding.

It has been shown that the claim of Cock's Boecklein of 1539 to be an earlier edition of 'Souter Liedekens' has broken down. A second candidate for that honour is in our judgment equally unsustainable.

A single copy of 'Souter Liedekens' exists in a private collection at The Hague, with the date 1539. This copy has been carefully examined by Dr. Scheurleer, and he identifies it, on grounds which seem irrefutable, with the 1559 edition of S. Cock. The title carries the block first used by him in that edition. The text is absolutely identical, while his examination convinces him that the date on the title has been tampered with.

One other point of deep interest remains to be noticed. The tune set to Psalm xix. contains the germ of our 'Old Hundreth,' thus putting back the received date of this tune by several years. We believe that the late Major Crawford was the first to make this discovery, which proves his acquaintance with the work forming the subject of this article. It would be a great delight if one could have the opportunity of gathering together and comparing the whole of the earlier editions; but this is, of course, only a dream! Unfortunately, the British Museum gives us little help, for it possesses no edition earlier than 1561—i.e., no example whatever printed by Cock.

Comparing this work with other metrical versions of the Psalms, it appears that the first complete Sternhold and Hopkins saw the light in 1551. Two years earlier (in 1549) Robert Crowley, Vicar of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, is said to have verified the whole of the Psalms, while Clément Marot's earliest attempts are dated 1539. We think, therefore, that we are justly entitled to claim 'Souter Liedekens' as the first to bring the work to completion, while the 'Boecklein' of 1539 undoubtedly remains the first example of the use of printed musical notes in the Netherlands.

ST. MICHAEL, CROOKED LANE, AND ITS ORGANS.

BY ANDREW FREEMAN.

When one reads of priceless national records—Magna Charta itself amongst them—being so little thought of that they could be crammed together in sacks and cast aside into a disused loft (and that not so long ago), it is not surprising that amongst the documents rescued from so ignominious a fate, and now safely stored in the Public Record Office in Chancery Lane, those bearing on musical subjects should be comparatively few in number. The wonder is that any should have survived at all. Perhaps those who knew of their existence thought they were not worth selling to the antiquaries of their day: they were obviously not clean enough for use as wrappers for butter or cheese. They might have been burned as useless litter; but, fortunately—there was the loft! From many a dusty parchment so saved a light is thrown down some forgotten court or alley off the main track of history, giving us a vivid, if transitory, glimpse of its householders and their petty cares and worries. To the parishioners of St. Michael, for instance, the possession of an organ, or rather of the wreck of one, was not even a matter of concern to themselves until the eagle eye and long arm of Laud made it so, greatly to their discomfort. Since they had an organ in their church, why was it not used? If it was out of order, why had it not been repaired? Let the parish see to it forthwith, or be prepared for the consequences. Such, one can see, was the command, stern and incisive. The reply, interesting, quaint, and (so far as it relates to the instrument itself) conclusive, follows:

St. Michael Crooked-lane.

The reasons why the Inhabitants and Parishioners are not able to sett up the Organs againe and the time since they were taken downe.

That the organs were never used in the church since Queene Maries dayes and when the roodlofte which was the place where they stood was taken downe they were also sett aside.

That they are soe old rotten and decayed that noe workeman can repaire them, there is only 37 old pipes worth 9^d a pound and all the rest not worth anything.

That whereas the inhabitants heretofore have in marchants, stockfishmongers and men of great estates, now for the most parte they are poore handycrafte tradesmen and not able to maintaine a paire of organs.

There was never noe land nor any maintenance given in our parishe for that use as wee understande Sr John Lambe was informed.

That considering that our Ordinary and necessary general collections such as must of necessity be collected as the shipp money, and for the maintenance of the poore and visited houses have been of late more than wee are well able to bare wee humbly desire Sr John Lambe not to put us to this charge but to dismishe the court of this busines that wee may bee no further troubled.

Crooked-Lane reasons agt ye organs.

D. Nash [?]

March [?] 1637*

Stow, writing in 1598, calls St. Michael's a 'fair church,' and tells us that it had taken the place of an older building which was 'but a small and homely thing, standing upon part of that ground wherein now standeth the parsonage house.'

A new church, built by Wren in 1688 to replace the one destroyed by the Great Fire, was in its turn demolished in 1831 to make room for new approaches to London Bridge. In 'New Remarks of London,' collected by the Company of Parish Clerks in 1733, it is stated that this church had at that time no organ, the parishioners evidently being of the same mind as their predecessors of a century earlier. Later on, however, there was a change of opinion, for at the time the church was pulled down it contained an instrument of some kind, though nothing seems to be known concerning its contents.

Shrubsole's tune 'Miles Lane' was named after the Meeting House in Miles (i.e., Michael's) Lane, frequented by the composer. In 1671, when as yet few City churches had been rebuilt after the Fire, Charles II. ordered that certain places hitherto used as conventicles should henceforth be used as churches and served by orthodox ministers appointed by the Bishop of London. The Meeting House in Miles Lane was one of the selected buildings, being described on the list as a 'large room, with two galleries, and thirty-nine forms.' Like the old church, from which it took its name, and the last church, whose place it supplied for some seventeen years, all traces of this old Meeting House have long since disappeared. The Lane and the tune alone are left.

Sir John Lambe (c. 1566-1647), referred to in the document given above, was a zealous member of the High Commission Court, from 1629 until its abolition by the Long Parliament. He made himself very unpopular by his high-handed and vigorous prosecutions; and it is curious to find that one of the charges upon which he was ordered to appear before a Committee of the House of Commons, in 1640-41, was that he had compelled the parishioners of Waddesdon (Bucks) to maintain an organ and an organist at a cost of £15 a year.†

* State Papers Domestic: Car. I.: Vol. 351, No. 102.

† The Dictionary of National Biography, from which these particulars of Sir John Lambe are taken, makes it two organs, but this is obviously a misreading of the term pair of organs.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING.

The twelfth annual general meeting of the Liverpool Church Choir Association was held on March 3 in the Town Hall, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. The Bishop of Liverpool and Sir Edward Russell both referred to the ever-present difficulty of congregational singing, and, while recognising and welcoming the many good things accomplished by the Association for the improvement of choir singing, launched into the old controversy mentioned above. We wish it were possible to procure copies of an admirable article by the late Sir John Stainer which appeared in the Globe some years ago. But we almost fear even so strong a testimony would fail to convince them. When we are told by Sir Edward Russell that the Te Deum and the Benedicite omnia opera belong to the congregation, it will at once be evident that in some cases the subject may be given up as hopeless. The Bishop, while feeling that in cathedrals and the chief churches the finest musical services should be encouraged, was yet of opinion that in the ordinary churches congregational singing should be the rule. Sir John Stainer in the article to which we refer quite rightly urged that if a window should require decoration, or the walls of the church ornamentation by carving, the scheme of such work being entrusted to members of the congregation was no more likely to be artistically successful than were their weekly efforts in the musical rendering of the service. We recently had the privilege of attending a service in a Royal Chapel, and the performances of a lady in the congregation, not only in the hymns but in the psalms and canticles also, were anything but edifying. The chief features were a dreadful voice and an astonishing lack of musical knowledge. It will be urged that she was giving her best. But this is just where art steps in, and it is strange that of all the arts employed in Divine worship, music is the only one which is not safeguarded from mutilation.

Such a performance as we have noted gives offence to many. We shall always agree that the hymns are the people's own, and no doubt in the general effect the raucous and untrained voice is rendered in some degree harmless. The cultivation of the Christian spirit of humility and self-abnegation would seem a more suitable attitude in many cases. There are doubtless examples of churches whose choirs endeavour to emulate the style of the Cathedral Service, and though such an ideal is far from unworthy, they often fail to produce such an effect as would have been theirs by more modest effort.

Sir Edward Russell laid down that certain people were irritated by a musical service. We say, let them curb their irritation, remembering that many find music uplifting and exceedingly helpful to devotion. We have little patience with their attitude, and trust that our organists and choir-masters will remain undaunted by such criticisms, and continue in their praiseworthy efforts to make the music of the Church Service as artistically beautiful as should be every other adjunct to worship.

A largely-attended meeting was held on February 21 at St. William's College, York, to consider the presentation of a testimonial to Mr. T. Tertius Noble on his retirement from the post of organist of York Minster. His Grace The Archbishop of Canterbury presided, and in an eloquent speech paid a high tribute to Mr. Noble's work in York and the neighbourhood. Others present included the Dean of York, the Lord Bishop of Sheffield, Canon Watson, &c. Enthusiastic speeches were made by the Dean and by Sir William Worsley, Bart., and on the motion of the Dean the following resolution was unanimously carried: 'That a public testimonial be presented to Mr. T. T. Noble on his leaving York for America, in recognition of his great services to music during his fifteen years' residence in the city.' A large and representative general committee was formed, which included the Archbishop, the Dean, and a host of well-known residents. The executive committee is headed by the Dean, the names having been submitted by Mr. Jalland and seconded by Councillor K. E. T. Wilkinson.

A Walcker divided organ has been placed by Messrs. Murdoch, Murdoch & Co. in the Catholic Church, Bedford. It is fitted with Walcker's latest action, rocking stop tablets, and several other unique features.

An exceptionally interesting scheme of music was again drawn up for the Holy Week Services at Westminster Cathedral. Tallis, Byrd, Shepherd, Tye, Whyte, and other English composers were largely drawn upon, and of course Palestrina, Allegri and Di Lasso. The whole of Tallis's Lamentations were included. The greater part of the music was English. Over twenty of the pieces were understood to be given for the first time since the Reformation. The whole programme was a further example of Dr. R. R. Terry's unique enthusiasm, knowledge, and energy in this field.

In view of the recent appearance in these columns of articles on Sigfrid Karg-Elert, the well-known composer for the organ, by Dr. Eaglefield Hull, it is interesting to note that Dr. Hull gave a recital of Karg-Elert's works at the Royal Academy of Music on February 26. The programme was as follows:

Chaconne and Chorale in B flat minor.

Choral Preludes:—‘O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden.’

‘Aus meines Herzens Grunde.’

‘Näher, mein Gott, zu Dir!’

Variations from the Passacaglia in E flat minor.

‘Drei Pastelle,’ No. 1.

‘Clair de Lune.’

Improvisation in E.

Bourrée et Musette.

Fantasia and Fugue in D major, Op. 39.

The recital was preceded by a short account of the composer and his works.

The trustees of Wilson College, Pa., U.S.A., have unanimously decided to accept the specifications and plans of Dr. Orlando A. Mansfield, the professor of music, for a concert organ of four manuals and fifty stops, and have appointed a committee to confer with Dr. Mansfield and to proceed with the erection of the new instrument forthwith. The cost, in addition to the incorporation of the present instrument, to be not less than £1,000.

On February 25, the degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon Mr. E. H. Thorne, the organist of St. Anne's, Soho, by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Mr. F. B. Kiddle has resigned the post of organist at Marylebone Parish Church.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

A selection of numbers from the settings by Rossini and Dvorák of the ‘Stabat Mater’ was given under the direction of Mr. Herbert Hodge at St. Mary-le-Strand, on February 26. The vocalists were Miss Maude Wilby, Miss Rosina Baker, and Messrs. Ernest Stépan and Graham Smart.

On February 26 a performance of Dvorák's ‘Stabat Mater’ (English adaptation) was given at the Bethlehem Congregational Church, Rhoslanerchrugog, North Wales, by the Bethlehem United Church Organ Society conducted by Mr. Dan Roberts. The principals were Madame Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Lilian G. Rickard, Mr. John Roberts, and Mr. Herbert Brown. Dr. Caradog Roberts presided at the organ. The performance was followed by a miscellaneous programme.

A performance of the Passion music from Handel's ‘Messiah’ was given in February by the Avon Vale Musical Society. Bath Abbey was chosen for the occasion, and under such conditions the necessary atmosphere was assured, and an excellent performance obtained. The soloists were Miss Winifred Bowden Smith, Countess Valda Gleichen, and Mr. J. P. Prior. The orchestra, of which Mrs. Fortlage was leader, numbered thirty-two, and Mr. A. E. New played the organ. Mr. J. S. Liddle was the conductor.

Mauder's ‘Olivet to Calvary’ was given in St. Mary's Church, Loughton, on March 3, by the Loughton Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Henry Riding, with Mr. E. C. Nunn as organist.

On Sunday evening, March 9, Cuthbert Nunn's cantata ‘Everyman’ was given by the choir before a large congregation at Woodford Parish Church. The composer presided at the organ, and Mr. John W. Cox, the organist and choir-master, conducted.

A praiseworthy performance of Dvorák's ‘Stabat Mater’ was given at St. John's Church, Upper St. Leonards, on March 12, by the choir, assisted by the Musical Society and an orchestra of local players. Mr. Leonard O'Connor (the organist) conducted, and Mr. T. S. Guyer (of Bexhill Parish Church) accompanied at the organ.

Brahms's ‘Requiem’ was given (with orchestral accompaniment) as a Lenten service at Chichester Cathedral on March 13, under Mr. F. J. W. Crowe's direction. The singing was as usual of high quality, and an impressive interpretation resulted. Mr. Reginald Stewart and choristers sang the solo parts.

S. B. Leonard, a youth at Allhallows' School, Honiton, has just won in open competition the organ scholarship at Merton College, Oxford. He has been a pupil of Mr. John E. Campbell, the music-master at Allhallows' School, for the past three-and-a-half years. As Mr. Leonard is only seventeen years of age much may be expected of him, and his career will be watched with interest.

At a meeting of the Glasgow Society of Organists held on March 15, Dr. Shinn gave a lecture on ‘Ear-training and its relation to other matters of musical education.’

 Master Frank Crane, leading boy, Lichfield Cathedral.
 Mr. Arthur Yould, organist and choirmaster of St. Giles's Church, Shrewsbury.

Reviews.

Dictionary of Organs and Organists. Edited by Frederick W. Thornsbey.

[H. Logan & Co., Bournemouth.]

This book, admirable in many ways, deals with questions interesting to organists and those best described as 'organicians.' It includes a brief history of the organ and an excellent article on organ-cases. The rather delicate subject of the relation of organists and clergy is treated in a manner helpful to all (and there are unfortunately many) who may have occasion to examine their position in this respect. We only hope some such agreement as is recommended may be regularly adopted, though there is much to be done before a wholly satisfactory solution of the problem is reached.

The articles on choir-training, and the position of the organist in the Church of Scotland, are of interest, and the matter relating to organ-building and builders of New York City will be found profitable. The accounts of London and Provincial organs, though many of little or no interest are included, make attractive reading to the enthusiast on such matters. The short sketch of French historical organs is also worthy of mention.

In the publishers' Introduction we read that the addendum to the book gives 'brief biographies of the leading organists throughout the country.' It is also hoped 'that the public appreciates the comprehensiveness and reliability of the publication. . . . We do not know whether the publishers are possessed of a strong sense of humour, but if not they can surely only plead ignorance when we point out the omission (in 'The Organists' Who's Who') of such names as Sir Walter Parratt, Dr. Walter Alcock, Mr. Charles Macpherson, Dr. Walford Davies, Dr. C. H. Lloyd, Mr. Alfred Hollins, Dr. Huntley, Dr. Harding, Dr. E. H. Thorne, Dr. Mann, Dr. Pyne, Dr. Naylor, Dr. Charles Wood, Dr. Buck, Dr. Brewer, &c. We have here the Master of the King's Music, who plays the organ at Windsor Castle, there is the organist who played the organ at the Coronation of King Edward VII. and King George V., the organist of the Temple Church, the sub-organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, and there are Cathedral and ex-Cathedral organists, and many others whose names are equally well known wherever Church and organ music are understood.

Album of Selected Pieces by William Byrd. Edited by Granville Bantock.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The revival of interest in, and knowledge of, the English composers of the Great Period is a welcome sign of our own increasing musical consciousness in the present day. Byrd, Gibbons, Bull, Farnaby, and the rest, form a group whose work was unsurpassed in their own day, and which by no means deserves the comparative neglect into which it has fallen, and this series of Albums should do much to restore to them their due fame. Their music has been somewhat difficult of access; the FitzWilliam Virginal Book is large and expensive, and the notation is unfamiliar and frequently puzzling to the untrained eye. In the present series the notation is modernized; a representative selection of pieces is given, together with a biographical sketch, and notes on the various pieces included, so that the public at large may readily form a fair idea of the writers thus republished.

William Byrd (circa 1542-1622) was regarded in his own day as foremost in his profession, and the cheque-book of the Chapel Royal (of which he was a member), in recording his death, speaks of him as 'Father of Musicke.' Being a Catholic, he suffered some inconveniences in consequence under Elizabeth and James I., though he was so valuable that he was spared serious persecution. His church music was mostly written to Latin and adapted to English words. As a madrigal writer he was not, perhaps, so successful, his nature being rather serious for this lighter style. There are over seventy of his pieces in the FitzWilliam Virginal Book (1608-16), besides those in other collections.

The selection in this Album is a good and representative one. Of the two Preludes, the one here given is certainly the more interesting. A remarkable piece is the 'Bells,' on a ground-bass, C, D, as in 'Sumer is icumen in.' A jig, a galliard, and a Miserere follow, the last being the polyphonic treatment of a chant. Next come some variations on the tune of 'O mistress mine,' as sung at the production of 'Twelfth night,' about 1600. There are also some interesting variations on the tune of the old ballad, 'The carman's whistle,' 'The woods so wild,' too, has really some atmosphere, and, as Professor Bantock says, 'realises to some extent the poetry of the subject.' Altogether the Album is a welcome addition to our available stock of the literature of the period.

John Field: sein Leben und seine Werke. By Heinrich Dessauer.

[Langensalze: Hermann Beyer & Sohn.]

Of course, as is well known, the name of John Field is imperishably associated with the Nocturne, and yet, save for Liszt's Preface, no attempt at a monograph on the inventor of this delightful art form has as yet been presented to the public. Herr Heinrich Dessauer now comes forward to supply this desideratum, and his monograph (in German) was accepted as a dissertation for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at the University of Leipzig.

The present work runs to 118 pages, and shows a tolerable acquaintance with the biography of Field from 1807 till his death in 1837, but evidently Herr Dessauer has not kept himself up to date in his account of the early struggles of this gifted Irish composer. In consequence of this non-acquaintance with recently-published material, Herr Dessauer simply repeats the old error of assuming that Field only began his musical career in London in 1794. The fact is that John Field of Dublin made his debut in his native city at a Rotunda concert given by Giordani on March 24, 1792, when he performed a Concerto by Krumpholtz. His second appearance was also in Dublin, in conjunction with Madame Gautherot (the famous lady violinist) on April 4, 1792, when he played a new Concerto by Giordani. He again appeared at a third Dublin concert on April 14. His London debut was not till May, 1794, under the auspices of Clementi, and on February 7, 1799, he appeared at the King's Theatre, Haymarket, as composer of a Concerto for the pianoforte.

Perhaps the most interesting portion of Dessauer's monograph is the section showing the indebtedness of Chopin to Field, and he prints extracts in parallel columns which prove that the borrowings are more than accidental.

In addition, there is a section on portraits of Field, and also a very good bibliography. It is interesting to add that the centenary of the Nocturne will be due in 1914.

Folk-songs of England. Edited by Cecil J. Sharp.

Book IV. Folk-songs from various Countries. Collected by Cecil J. Sharp.

Book V. Folk-songs from Sussex. Collected by W. Percy Merrick.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Cecil J. Sharp continues his self-imposed labours as a collector and editor of English Folk-song. The result of his most recent labours in this direction is seen in Books IV. and V. of 'Folk-songs of England.'

Book IV. contains songs collected in Worcestershire, Warwickshire, Oxfordshire, Gloucestershire, Berkshire, Devonshire, and Cambridge—in all, twenty-two items. It must not be supposed that the songs and tunes are peculiar to these counties, but they have been collected in the places indicated. The first song, 'Bold Nelson's praise,' is undoubtedly a fine ballad, but the tune is a thinly-disguised variant of O'Carolan's 'Princess Royal,' one of the most popular melodies of the great Irish harper and composer. Several of the other items are capital specimens of folk-ballads, and will be very welcome to those who wish for variety in folk-song recitals.

Book V. contains fifteen songs and tunes collected ten years ago by Mr. W. Percy Merrick, all obtained from one singer, a farmer from Sussex. The pianoforte accompaniments are by R. Vaughan Williams, save that to No. 15, which is by Mr. Albert Robins. 'The pretty Ploughboy' is a pleasing version of 'Down at the bottom of the sea.' It is strange that Mr. Sharp did not recognise 'Captain Grant' as a well-known Anglo-Irish ballad. In order to give it a local colour, 'Edinburgh Jail' is substituted for Maryborough, the actual place of detention of the renowned Irish highwayman, Jeremiah Grant, who was hanged at Maryborough, Queen's County, on August 12, 1816. The tune is Irish, and it has been printed by Petrie and Joyce. A variant of it is known as 'The Inniskillen Dragoon.' The tune of 'The maid of Islington' is a debased form of the melody of 'The Bailly's daughter of Islington' from 'The Jovial Crew,' in 1731. 'The Isle of France' is an Anglo-Irish ballad set to a 17th-century Irish tune. On the whole Book V. is a most interesting collection.

THE PEDAL ORGAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—No one can be more interested than myself in any question which relates to the improvement of the Pedal organ, but is not Dr. Froggatt inclined to confuse the term 'bass' with that of 'double bass'? Surely the whole question may be reasonably determined by a reference to the orchestra. The bass and double-bass of the strings are respectively the 'cello and the 'double-bass'; of the other families, the bassoon and its double; trombone and contrabass-trombone. A bass-flute and a double-bass clarinet have also been evolved, and signs are not wanting to show that every family will soon be divided into four different sizes, as are the strings. But the point is that these double-basses are not 'continuations' of their respective basses, but that they are of bigger scale, and possess a certain weight and distinctive quality of their own.

Violins (first and second), violas, 'cellos: three different scales. On a keyed instrument we have to give up this scaling and consequent distinctive quality of tone in different parts of the gamut on any one clavier. A rank of pipes (five octaves or thereabouts) virtually consists of one violin, viola, or 'cello, flute, oboe, or what not, of extended compass. As a consequence, crossing of parts is not so effective as is the case where a band—whether of voices, strings, or wind—is concerned.

The Pedal clavier is the recognised means for doubling the various basses, and also for making the tone of the basses more distinctive by means of separate 8-feet ranks distinct from those on the manuals. The manual claviers then supply trebles, altos, tenors, and basses, though the actual bass part is more often than not played through the Pedal clavier by means of couplers.

Theoretically and logically, Dr. Froggatt may be right in contending that anything on the Pedal beyond 'continuations' is superfluous. But if so, may it not with equal reason be urged that the 'double-bass' of the orchestra be reduced in size, and its scale be made proportionate to and a continuation of the violoncello; in short, that it be turned into a 'double 'cello' with the same quality and weight of tone as that of the 'cello?

Where space and funds are limited, 'continuations' of manual basses are preferable to no double basses at all, and I will go so far as to say that in the case of certain delicate qualities of tone and also in the case of secondary ranks there is little or no reason for ever making double basses from independent ranks. But I doubt whether the ear would ever become reconciled to the total exclusion of the 'double bass' or of independent 16-feet 'opens' of wood and of metal.

In this country organs containing both independent and several continued ranks in the shape of double basses are perhaps few and far between; consequently, Sir, if Lieutenant-Colonel Dixon and Dr. Froggatt would care for further practical experiment, I shall have much pleasure in affording them the opportunity of confirming or modifying their views. I can offer seven 'continuations,' three of which are unenclosed, and two independent ranks, all serving as double basses; also one independent bass, itself derived from a double bass. One or two other experiments bearing on this subject are available, but are more easily shown than described. The instrument is only a three-decker, but it is easily possible to realise the composer's exact intentions in the 'Festal March' to which Dr. Froggatt alludes.

The Rev. J. Lawrence would seem to imply that the stop 'Night Horn' is not to be found in this country. There is a 'Cor de Nuit' in the organs at Westminster Abbey and at St. Mary's, Beverley, and I think elsewhere—but this is by the way.

Would the magnificence of any well-known and really fine instrument in or out of London be improved in ensemble if every manual rank were continued down one octave, and all independent double bass ranks removed? Would there not be some loss in weight and grandeur and in 'point'—this last in the upper octave and half of the Pedal compass?—I am, Sir, Your obedient Servant,

K. G. BURNS.

THE PASSION CHORALE.

In reference to the discussion, printed in our March issue, between 'Z' and Mr. Ernest Newman's to Bach's use of the 'Passion Choral,' Mr. Henry Davey writes:

'The tune known in England as the "Passion Choral" belongs to "Herzlichlich mich Verlangen," a hymn expressing the desire for Death, the gate of heaven. Bach used the tune rather often, and by altering the melody and varying the treatment, made it serve the most opposite purposes. At the end of Cantata 161 it becomes a song of triumph, and still more exultingly so at the end of the "Christmas Oratorio" (1734). In the "St. Matthew" Passion (1729) it had been used to the Passion Choral "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden" (Nos. 21, 23, 63, and 72—the last with material alterations in the melody); and also to the devotional hymn "Befiehl Du meine Wege" (No. 53). It is also used in several cantatas and various hymns. Its appearance could hardly have suggested Passion-music to a Leipsic audience in 1734, especially as "a certain incomparable Passion" was found too dramatic and secular for the church. There is no evidence that Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion was performed between 1729 and its retouching in 1740, and one must regret that Spitta and others have given currency to the fancy that some allusion to the "St. Matthew" Passion was understood in the "Christmas Oratorio." The tune "Herzlichlich mich Verlangen" is directed to be sung to nearly thirty different hymns in Schemelli's Gesangbuch, which was edited by Bach.

'The following works will repay examination by Bach students, even if they know little German:

'Vopelius: Gesangbuch (1682).—This was the official Leipsic hymn-book, and contains also the plain-song for Liturgies, Passions, &c.

'Schemelli (1736).—This contains the words of nearly a thousand hymns, with a few new tunes by Bach.

'Scriber (?): New Leipziger Gesangbuch in Geistliches Haus-Opfer (1724) and Neue Sammlung (1745).—A large collection of hymns, with devotional works by Scriber. The tune to be used is generally named. All these may be seen in the British Museum—Vopelius and Schemelli in the musical section, Scriber in the general library.'

WAGNER AND SUPER-WAGNER.

Mr. Ernest Newman writes:

I gather from a letter in your last month's number that Mr. Frederick Corder is once more seriously disturbed as to the trend of things musical. As far as my recent observation of Mr. Corder goes, he seems to spend his spare time standing in the middle of the high road of music, waving his arms and shouting 'No thoroughfare' at the top of his voice, and looking astonished and annoyed when busy people who are going somewhere refuse to stop. It is the old, old story: none of us must see further down the road than Mr. Corder—as soon as his breath gives out, all the rest of us must stop running.

Really, Mr. Corder is the most naïf controversialist I have ever met with. His methods of quasi-argument are positively touching in their simplicity. Note how easily he wipes Scriabine's 'Prometheus' off the slate. If a Haydn symphony is music, he says, then 'Prometheus' is not, 'for you cannot name a point in which the two styles are not absolutely contradictory.' 'If a man,' Mr. Corder continues, 'says he admires Bucciuni or Severini, and also Raphael and Michael Angelo, I say,—well, Mr. Corder's breath fails him and he cannot say anything. The charm of this method is that it reduces everything to a sort of self-evident equation:

Scriabine : Haydn :: Bucciuni : Raphael.

All the reader has to do is to assume, with Mr. Corder, that there cannot be the least question as to the later Scriabine being merely a musical Bucciuni,—which is the very thing to be proved. Like other conjurers, Mr. Corder gets his funny little rabbit out of the hat only because he put it there first. If we profess ourselves dissatisfied with this martial-law-and-no-dam-nonsense method of settling an artistic question, we have to face the grave fact—Mr. Corder himself assures us of the gravity of it—that we are differing from Mr. Corder on a matter on which it is simply incredible that he should be wrong. He pooh-poohs certain modern views on Bach that do not appeal to him. It is true that these views are held by many very distinguished students of Bach; but this does not weigh with the ruthless Mr. Corder. When he reads these views, he says sadly, but yet with a touch of Roman fortitude in his grief, 'it makes me wonder whether my life's experience of music has all been thrown away.' Surely that settles it: if we have to choose between a mere gang of fellows like Pirro and Schweitzer and Wolfmum and the sad possibility that Mr. Corder stands not where he did, who with a heart in his breast could falter in his choice?

As regards the article of mine that ostensibly called forth Mr. Corder's letter, I need not say much more than that I am not, as he appears to think, the only person in the world who believes that music may before long attempt to build up a quasi-dramatic world of its own without the aid of words and action—or at all events of so many words and so much action as Wagner found it necessary to use. I see from a newspaper report that Stravinsky has recently expressed a similar opinion; and within the last few days I have found a form of the kind I have outlined hinted at in the concluding volume of M. Romain Rolland's 'Jean Christophe.' But I will not argue the point again here, if for no other reason than that Mr. Corder has plainly only half-understood it. Certain other things, I am afraid, he does not even half-understand, as when he sneers at me for speaking of music expressing 'soul states'—an expression, as it happens, that I derived from Wagner.

But if there is nothing in Mr. Corder's letter that can strictly be said to bear on the argument I submitted last month, there is a good deal of amusement to be had from watching the workings of Mr. Corder's mind. Here he is again at his naïf old dodge of setting up a scarecrow of his own, calling it by the name of his opponent, demolishing it to his heart's content, and then crowing with lusty self-approbation over the supposed demise of his opponent. He pretends, for example, that I 'really believe that music can exist as such without intellectual support,—that it is a state, a mood, an epileptic seizure—a trance.' Of course I never said anything of the sort. I have always urged that a great deal of music has what we may roughly call an intellectual support,—that is to say, it is not merely beautiful pattern-weaving. What I was driving at in the sentence that Mr. Corder so grievously misunderstands was that this intellectual support might be given in other ways than the often cumbrous way of the opera. This was the point of the whole article. Mr. Corder has either not read the article or not understood it.

Not liking my notion of a form of music that shall eliminate as many of the external unessentials or semi-essentials as possible, Mr. Corder characteristically attempts to discredit it by a breathless series of grotesque analogies. My new form of art would be a tart all jam and no pastry, an umbrella without a stick, and so on. I really wish some first-year student of logic would get hold of Mr. Corder, give him five minutes' talking-to, and demonstrate to him once for all that you cannot dispose of an argument by fastening absurd pseudo-analogies upon it. The fact that you cannot have an umbrella without a stick does not at all prove that you cannot have dramatic music with less waste matter in it than a good many operas have at present. Mr. Corder has apparently forgotten the existence of a certain composer named Beethoven, who managed to build up very impressive pictures of human hearts at war with themselves and with fate, and all without words or action. I venture to suggest that now that music has won a new power of expression and a new logic of form through Wagner and Strauss and others, the same kind of thing can be done in a slightly different way and on a bigger scale. After all, what will it be but a further pursuit of the line that Wagner took? When Mr. Corder sneers at me for wishing to free music, as far as possible, from verbal and other padding, has he forgotten that this was Wagner's own avowed ideal? Has he forgotten how Wagner plumed himself on having, as he thought, achieved this ideal in 'Tristan,' after many years of floundering? Why should we not dream of a still further concentration of the dramatic 'stuff' that music is to use as its core? (Mr. Corder, in his usual hurry and with his usual naïveté, imagines that I am predicting or advocating a more simple music in the future! It is merely another proof of his failure to understand what we must be charitable enough to assume he has read.)

Mr. Corder's hasty verbalisations—I can hardly call them arguments—land him at one point in a position that may be a little dangerous for him. He actually lays it down that 'so long as we are human' we cannot have 'an opera without padding.' I should like to have Wagner's opinion on that dictum. Anyhow, here we have a professor of composition blandly making terms with padding,—a thing no teacher of composition should ever do. If we can be sure of any æsthetic proposition it is this,—that the aim of the musician should be to weed out of his work every bar that is not related with the most organic necessity to everything that comes before and after it. Does Mr. Corder really teach composition upon the easy-going principle he has here laid down? If so, I am sorry for his pupils. But I fancy the truth is simply that here, as elsewhere, his pen has outrun his discretion.

But perhaps I am taking Mr. Corder's verbal catherine wheels too seriously. I have a lurking suspicion that the whole letter was really written simply to bring in that joke at the finish about 'The Importance of being Ernest.'

The joke is quite a good one, even though it has been made many times before. (I think my wife was the first to make it.) Still, though I am constrained, in the interests of historical truth, to point out that Mr. Corder's little sally is not original, I hope he won't be discouraged. He may do better next time. We mustn't lose heart. Sursum Corder.

While I am on the subject, perhaps I may be allowed to say a word in reply to one or two other critics of my article, who have also misunderstood certain parts of it. A writer in the Yorkshire Observer, for example, urges against me in all gravity (1) that Strauss has written five operas in twelve years, and (2) that the theatre-going public likes plot, stage action, and so on. I cannot dispute either statement. But then I never denied that some operas are excellent things, and never predicted that the present form of opera would disappear. I expressly pointed out that the term 'drama' was elastic enough to cover works so diverse in form and spirit as those of Æschylus, Calderon, Shakespeare, Galsworthy, Maeterlinck, Shaw, and Yeats. 'Dramatic music' is also comprehensive enough to include other forms and expressions besides those of the present opera; and in urging that these other forms might be allowed admittance I never contended that opera would, should or could be kicked out. There will always be a certain number of people who will prefer opera to any other form of music precisely because of the amount of padding in it; the intellectual strain of listening is less. But surely it is permissible for those who can do without padding in music to desire a musical-dramatic art in which neither the composer's nor the hearer's time shall be frittered away on so many things that do not matter.

And, as one critic pointed out, there will always be subjects that simply could not be expressed in any other form than that of opera,—the 'Meistersinger,' for example. But I should have thought this fact so obvious that no one could assume any writer to have overlooked it.

Obituary.

We regret also to announce the following deaths:

PROFESSOR FELIX DRAESEKE, who passed away at Dresden on February 26, after a short illness. Born in Coburg on October 7, 1835, he studied first in Leipzig and afterwards with Liszt at Weimar. He settled in Dresden in 1876, where until recently he held a professorship in composition, at the Conservatoire. In company with Hans von Bülow, Joachim Raff, Peter Cornelius, and others, he was among the first to uphold the 'music of the future.' He was himself a prolific composer of a certain austere individuality and great technical powers. His works include three great symphonies, five operas, symphonic-poems, concertos, chamber-music, pianoforte pieces, songs, &c. His gifts were perhaps displayed at their best in his big choral works—the Mass in F sharp minor and his chef-d'œuvre the 'Christus-mysterium,' a cycle of four big oratorios.

ROBERT HILTON, who was a lay-vicar at Westminster Abbey from 1871 to 1911. He was born at Preston in 1840. In his prime he was in great request at oratorio concerts, but later in life he preferred to confine his energies to the service music at the Abbey and to the meetings of the Abbey Glee Club, the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Glee Club, the London Glee and Madrigal Union, the Round, Catch, and Canon Club, and the City Glee Club. He possessed a fine, massive voice of exceptional profundity, and his appearance was dignified. We gave a portrait of the deceased in our February issue this year, in connection with a presentation made to him on his retirement from the Abbey Glee Club.

FRANCIS KORBAY, the well-known and greatly-esteemed Hungarian musician, suddenly, on March 9. He resided in London for many years up to the time of his death. In our next issue we shall give a sketch of his interesting career, and a portrait.

NAPOLEONE ZARDO, a well-known baritone and teacher of singing, born at Crespano in 1858. He was appointed a professor at the Guildhall School of Music in 1906. His opera 'La Vedova Scaltra' was produced in Italy in 1909.

FANNY PUZZI, born in 1834, long known and respected in musical and social London as an organizer of concerts. Her 'Matinées' were until recently a regular feature of the concert season.

On February 4, 1913, at Campden Hill, Kensington, ELIZA, widow of the late THOMAS IONS, Mus. Doc. Oxon., formerly of Newcastle-on-Tyne, aged ninety-eight.

FREDERICK BOWMAN, M.A., organist of Jesus College, Cambridge, died January 28, 1913, aged fifty-four years.

We regret that owing to the early date of going to Press, necessitated by the Easter Holidays, we can only record the deaths of Mr. John Thomas and Herr Erich Wolff. Full reference will be made in the May issue.

DR. E. W. NAYLOR'S 'PAX DEI' AT CAMBRIDGE.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

An event which was of special interest to the musical world of Cambridge occurred on February 27 last—namely, the performance of Dr. Naylor's new setting of the 'Requiem,' under the title of 'Pax Dei.' Those who have followed Dr. Naylor's musical career were prepared for a truly scholarly—not to be confounded with 'scholastic'—work, and one possessing melodic charm; but that he should have shown such command and incisive vigour as characterized much of the new work was perhaps not quite so much expected, except by those familiar with some of his less-known compositions. 'Pax Dei' is striking and impressive almost all through. A besetting fault of much 'cantata' work of the present day lies in the occurrence of many dull moments which, unfortunately, often become minutes! This cannot be charged to Dr. Naylor's composition. Perhaps one might select as the most pleasing the charming setting of the 'Recordare' for soprano solo, the final number 'Libera me' (which is very impressive), and the completely satisfactory setting of the Offertorium and Hostias, which opens with a singularly arresting phrase, dignified and impressive, and works up to a strong and virile fugue exposition at 'Quam olim Abraham.' The chorus-work is very effective, though possibly rather exacting in places. It is, however, so interesting as to claim the enthusiasm of any well-disposed body of singers Dr. Naylor has (apparently of set purpose) avoided to a large extent repetition of words or lengthening of phrases: the natural rise and fall of the concepts of the poem are so sudden and dramatic that in the process of following out this line of action it results that the climaxes appear to follow on one another too rapidly and closely. The mind has not time to recover its equipoise after one climax, fine though it may be, before another has to be faced; this leads to some want of balance and restfulness. Probably it is unavoidable under the scheme of interpretation adopted, and might be softened down at later performances. Dr. Naylor's work also exemplifies (to however small a degree) a curious point of artistic psychology. One often finds a composer has a sudden and brief lapse of critical faculty, resulting in the interpolation of commonplace in the midst of otherwise good work. A striking example is the last movement of César Franck's Pianoforte and Violin sonata, where the banality of the Coda to the last movement almost destroys the work: there are quartets by the great masters in which one movement is so impossible as almost to prevent performance of the whole. From this charge Dr. Naylor (in common with many whom he would reverence) is not wholly exempt. It may be mentioned that the work was done in English: a probable reason is that Verdi's 'Requiem' was recently performed at Cambridge in Latin. The translation is by the author, and is of quite extraordinary merit.

A work of such general excellence and strength should soon be heard by larger audiences. It is well worth the attention of one of the London or large Northern choral Societies.

The performance was a worthy one: the soloists, Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Grainger Kerr, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, and Mr. Charles Knowles, are to be congratulated on a very fine reading of their parts.

The 'Requiem' was followed by a performance of the third Act of 'Tannhäuser.'

The 'Universal Music and Dramatic Directory,' which is the English edition of the 'Annuaire des Artistes,' has been issued for 1913 by Messrs. E. Risacher, Paris. Its thousand pages (147 of which are devoted to England) are a prodigious example of industry in collecting a vast amount of information. The English editor is Mr. H. Bonnaire, 20, High Holborn.

First system of the musical score. It features a vocal line and a piano accompaniment. The vocal line begins with a treble clef and a key signature of two flats (B-flat and E-flat). The lyrics are: "fur-ther us with Thy con - tin - u - al help, with Thy con - tin - u - al". The piano accompaniment starts with a grand staff (treble and bass clefs). Dynamics include f (forte) and rit. e dim. (ritardando e diminuendo). A Ped. (pedal) marking is present at the end of the system.

Second system of the musical score, labeled "CHORUS." and "a tempo." The vocal line continues with the lyrics: "Pre - vent us, O Lord, pre - vent us, O Lord, in Pre - vent us, O Lord, pre - vent us, O Lord, in help. Pre - vent us, O Lord, pre - vent us, O Lord, in". The piano accompaniment is marked mp (mezzo-piano) and a tempo. Below the vocal line, the text "Accompaniment ad lib." is written. The system concludes with the lyrics "Pre - vent us, O Lord, . . pre - vent us, O Lord, in".

Third system of the musical score. The vocal line continues with the lyrics: "all, . . in all our do - ings with Thy . . most gra - cious all, in all our do - ings with Thy . . most gra - cious all, . . in all . . our do - ings with Thy . . most gra - cious all, in all our do - ings with Thy . . most gra - cious". London Concerts.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The annual performance of Elgar's 'The dream of Gerontius' was given at the Albert Hall on March 6, by the Royal Choral Society, under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge. The choral singing was on the Society's customary level. It was, however, the presence of Miss Muriel Foster as exponent of the music of the Angel that was most memorable. Miss Foster created the part, and still stands alone in it, just as Mr. Gervase Elwes, whose singing further distinguished the occasion, stands alone in the part of Gerontius. The music of the Priest and the Angel of the Agony was interpreted by Mr. Dalton Baker. The audience was very large, and further proof was thus given of the established popularity of the work.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The centre of interest in the concert of the London Symphony Orchestra at Queen's Hall, on March 10, was Tchaikovsky's 'Symphonie Pathétique,' in which M. Safonoff, the conductor of the evening, is well known to excel. The performance was musical and romantic or exciting as the occasion demanded, and the work exercised all its old grip on the public mind. A favourable impression was created by M. Glazounow's Symphonic-poem 'Spring,' which was given for the first time in London. It has the composer's characteristic refinement of texture and felicity of idea. There was no soloist at the concert, the remainder of the programme consisting of Vivaldi's A minor Concerto for strings and the Overtures to Wagner's 'Rienzi' and Smetana's 'The bartered bride.'

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The great attraction of the programme of the concert given on March 1 was the revival of the 'Symphonía Domestica' (Strauss). It was performed with the meticulous care that distinguishes all Sir Henry Wood's productions, but it cannot be said to have created a deep or favourable impression. Of course, there are beauties and novelties and splendour of orchestration, yet these alone, however they dazzle, do not give complete satisfaction. Another attraction was the playing of Busoni in Liszt's Concerto No. 2, in A, and the 'Rhapsodie Espagnole' (Liszt-Busoni), Balfour Gardiner's 'Shepherd Fennell's Dance,' and the 'Flying Dutchman' Overture.

At the concert on March 15 the Symphony was Beethoven's 'Eroica,' which was finely and individually interpreted under Sir Henry Wood's direction. Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music and Strauss's 'Don Juan' were other conspicuous features of the programme, and M. Jacques Thibaud gave refined readings of Mendelssohn's Violin concerto and of Bach's Concerto in E major for violin, organ, and strings.

THE ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The last concert of the season, which took place on March 13, was notable in that the programme consisted of two Symphonies written with choral Finales—Scriabine's first and Beethoven's ninth. Unfortunately, circumstances compelled the omission of Scriabine's Finale, and probably led judgment astray on the work as a whole. The four instrumental movements that were played seemed—to up-to-date ears—unambitious, designed merely to charm and not to stir the senses. Their melodic interest and beauty of texture were always enjoyable; perhaps the fifth movement would have added a more weighty attraction. Beethoven's Choral Symphony was effectively done under the direction of M. Safonoff, the conductor of the evening. The London Choral Society carried out an ungrateful task with enthusiasm and considerable ease. Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Edna Thornton, Mr. Morgan Kingston, and Mr. Harry Dearth were the soloists.

FREDERICK DELIUS'S 'A MASS OF LIFE.'

The extraordinary energy and enterprise of Mr. Thomas Beecham were never better exemplified than when on March 10, immediately after the close of his arduous opera season, he brought forward once more Delius's cantata 'A Mass of Life' at Covent Garden Theatre. The North Staffordshire District Choral Society, trained by Mr. Whittaker, of Blackpool fame, supplied the choir. The soloists were Madame Gura-Hummel, Miss Doris Woodall, Mr. Frederick Blamey, and Mr. Charles W. Clark. To us, at least, the performance was a very impressive one, although it was not perfect. The work is extraordinarily difficult, especially for the singers, and its methods of treatment of the choir are strange. But the beauty, sincerity, dignity, and great originality of the music were, to us, an almost constant fascination. All the soloists were competent, but a special word of praise is due to Mr. Clark, who had the most arduous task. The choir, although sometimes hesitant in attack, sang with that rare and peculiarly attractive beauty of tone that has always distinguished the singing-folk of Hanley.

THE BALFOUR GARDINER CONCERTS (QUEEN'S HALL).

At the second concert of this series, given on February 25, the programme was a varied one. A revised version of 'The shepherd,' a Phantasy Prelude by W. H. Bell, was the first item. It was effectively played under Mr. Gardiner. 'The mystic trumpeter,' for soprano solo and orchestra, composed by G. von Holst, was another quasi-novelty. This composer always displays fancy, but it cannot be said that in this long piece he is at his best. 'A Hill-song' for wood-wind, brass and percussion, served to show that Mr. Grainger is not quite so interesting when he composes as when he arranges. His 'Colonial song,' for soprano and tenor, was scarcely worthy the occasion. The two soloists sang throughout on the vowel 'aa'—a glorified Concone! Two songs by Quilter and three by Poldowski were welcome, and were finely sung by Mr. Elwes, and Mr. Norman O'Neill's Introduction, Mazurka, and Finale, Op. 43, was successfully performed under the direction of the composer. But by far the most striking feature of the concert was the fascinating 'Lebenstanz' by Delius. This was the first performance in England of a revised version of the work.

At the concert given on March 4 the 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols' for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, by Vaughan Williams, came first in the programme and created an excellent impression. Mr. Campbell McInnes was the soloist. 'Christmas Eve on the mountains,' an orchestral piece by Arnold Bax, was performed for the first time. It is well worthy the composer's growing reputation. Two folk-tune settings by Percy Grainger were pleasant, but scarcely striking items. The most important work in the programme was an Ode for chorus and orchestra, 'The cloud messenger' by Mr. von Holst. It took forty-two minutes to perform, and proved not to be particularly interesting. There are some fine climaxes, a female voice chorus to the words, 'Behold! the sacred city,' that has real beauty, but there is not sufficient continuous inspiration in the composition to maintain interest throughout. 'Gray Galloway,' for orchestra, by J. B. McEwen, was a welcome finale.

We must defer consideration of the last concert of the series until next month.

MR. HOLBROOKE'S ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

An orchestral concert which formed part of Mr. Holbrooke's season's scheme was given at Queen's Hall on March 14. The following was the programme:

Marche Funèbre (from 'Apollo' Symphony).

Prelude to the drama 'Dylan' for orchestra.

Scena ... 'O wavering fires'

Madame Jeanne Jomelli.

3rd and 4th Parts from a dramatic Symphony,

'Apollo and the Seaman' (Op. 51).

'Dance of Prince Prospero.'

Poem for orchestra ... 'Ulamme.'

Poem for orchestra and chorus ... 'Queen Mab.'

All the foregoing are compositions of Mr. Holbrooke. The only other composer represented was Mr. Cyril Scott, four songs by whom were finely sung by Madame Jomelli.

Notwithstanding an announcement that deadheads were not catered for, a respectable audience assembled to support the composer in his enterprise. It was a tribute to his powers that a 'one man' programme, lasting nearly three hours, held attention throughout. We cannot go into details here, especially as in our front article we give some general criticism of the composer's style and matter. On this occasion we were most struck by the Prelude to 'Dylan' and the 'Dance of Prince Prospero,' which exhibited Mr. Holbrooke at his best. The Edward Mason choir and the London Symphony Orchestra were the excellent resources brought to bear on this arduous programme, and Mr. Thomas Beecham and Mr. Holbrooke conducted.

THE EDWARD MASON CHOIR.

The most enterprising and altruistic concert of the season was given by this organization at Queen's Hall on February 27. The following was the programme:

- 'The skeleton in armour' ... Rutland Boughton.
- 'Villon' ... William Wallace.
- *Hymns from the Rig Veda' (3rd set) Gustav von Holst.
- 'Byron' ... Joseph Holbrooke.
- *'The Banshee' ... Leo France.
- *Three folk-music settings ... Percy Grainger.
- 'News from Whydah' ... Balfour Gardiner.

* First time of performance.

Mr. Von Holst's new 'Rig Veda' music is a fitting sequel to the first and second sets, which have earned a well-deserved reputation. It is fancy-free, and yet well thought-out. The design of it for female voices with harp accompaniment does not promote variety, but Mr. Von Holst has made it a natural medium, and his independence of thought fully sustains the interest. 'The Banshee,' by Mr. France, is an earnest effort which betrays inexperience. Some of Mr. Grainger's new music, on the other hand, suffered from too much experience, as it tended towards mannerism. The 'Willow' song, given by Madame Ada Crossley, was, however, more pleasing. In all the music, both new and old, the Choir worked enthusiastically, its best asset being good tone. Its task was a big one, and few choirs could have tackled it so successfully. Mr. Edward Mason conducted with ability.

MR. DUNHILL'S CONCERTS.

The series of chamber-music concerts given by Mr. Thomas Dunhill at Steinway Hall on February 21, 28, and March 7, has done good service. Each occasion served to bring to light, or restore to the light, some eminently deserving British work. On February 21, a strong and scholarly Phantasy Quintet, by Mr. James Friskin, for pianoforte and strings, was given its first performance by the composer and the Grimson Quartet. It is music of classical build and almost of classical stature. It was, however, overshadowed in imaginative flight by Dr. Vaughan Williams's superb song-cycle, 'On Wenlock Edge,' a work that is almost unequalled among British works in musical expressiveness and colour. The second concert provided the first performance of a Sonata by Mr. Nicholas Gatty, for violin and pianoforte, the executants being Miss Jessie Grimson and Miss Florence Hanson. This composer-critic still preserves his ideal of refinement. The Sonata does not affect the grand manner, but aims, and arrives, at expressing with appropriate conciseness a group of excellent and easily intelligible ideas. The texture is always that of a thorough and conscientious musician. The concert on March 7 opened with a good performance, given by Miss Marjorie Hayward and Mr. John Ireland, of the latter's new Sonata for violin and pianoforte. Mr. Ireland writes on an ambitious plane, and with some justification. He thinks intellectually, and expresses himself with an admirable technique. Each one of the works above described deserves many re-hearings, and we look forward to this consummation. Other works too numerous to mention in detail, including attractive examples of Mr. Dunhill's own chamber-music, made up an excellent series of programmes.

At the orchestral concert given by the Royal College of Music on February 20, Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony and Saint-Saëns's Violoncello concerto in A minor, with Mr. Harold Muslin as soloist, were the chief works in the programme.

The Festival of the London Sunday School Choir at the Albert Hall, on February 22, was an immense success. The choir of 1,000 voices, under Mr. William Whiteman, sang exceptionally well, as did also Miss Ruth Vincent and Mr. Robert Radford. The orchestra, as usual, gave separate numbers under Mr. Wesley Hammet, and Mr. H. L. Balfour gave organ solos.

The first concert of the newly-formed Elizabethan Madrigal Society took place under Mr. Lionel Benson's direction at the Royal College of Music on February 27.

Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony was an excellent choice for the concluding concert of Miss Kimpton's Series for Young People, at Æolian Hall, on February 22. Mr. Stewart Macpherson gave an excellent address on the composer and the work. Mr. Paul Ludwig (violin) and Mrs. Alfred Hobday (pianoforte) were the soloists of the occasion.

A concert at Æolian Hall, on February 24, illustrated the various and well-directed enthusiasm of the Society of Women Musicians. Female-voice part-music of diverse schools was sung by a small choir under the direction of Miss Emily Daymond, Mus.Doc. Mrs. Verne-Bredt's pianoforte Phantasy-trio and Movements from Glazounov's String quintet, Op. 39, were played attractively; Miss Maude Mellior (oboe) and Mr. Arthur Jones (harp) contributed; and songs by Miss Agnes Lambert were sung by Miss Evangeline Florence.

His Majesty The King was present at the smoking concert given by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society at Queen's Hall on February 26. Sir Frederic Cowen and Mr. Arthur Payne were the conductors, Miss Ada Forrest and Mr. Julien Henry the soloists. The programme, which was miscellaneous and well selected, was heartily enjoyed by all present.

Mr. Holbrooke's second concert took place at Æolian Hall on February 28. His 'Phantasy String quartet' and Sextet for pianoforte and strings were admired by a large audience, and the remainder of the programme included vocal numbers given by Miss Olga Loewenthal and Mr. Frederick Blamey.

The excellent Wessely String Quartet gave a concert at Bechstein Hall on March 1, and upheld their reputation by their performances of Mozart's Quartet in E flat (K. 428), César Franck's Pianoforte quintet (with Miss Johanne Stockmarr), and Brahms's String sextet in G (with Mr. James Lockyer and Mr. C. A. Crabbe).

The performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, given by the Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society on March 1, was as usual one of fine sonority and breadth. Mr. Allen Gill's command over his forces was as firm and inspiring as ever. The solo parts were taken by Madame Gleeson-White, Miss Gertrude Lonsdale, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

After the success of the performance of 'The Music Makers' given by the Oxford House Choral and Orchestral Society at Bethnal Green recently, it was natural that the work should have been chosen for the annual concert at Queen's Hall. This took place on March 3 in the presence of a large audience. Mr. Cuthbert Kelly again conducted a performance of great expressive depth, to which the refined solo singing of Miss Norah Dawney contributed. Orchestral numbers and folk-songs sung by the Excelsior Boys' Choir helped to make an interesting programme.

An admirable performance of Tchaikovsky's Trio in A minor was the feature of the concert of the London Trio at Æolian Hall on March 3. Miss Wynfred Manby (vocalist) and members of the Trio gave solos.

One of Mr. Donald F. Tovey's 'Chelsea' concerts took place at Æolian Hall on March 5. Brahms's Pianoforte quartet in G minor and an Air and Variations in B flat for string quartet by Mr. Tovey were played by the Ackroyd String Quartet, and further interest was added by the singing of Dr. Henschel.

An earnest research into new musical possibilities is being made by Herr Zacharewitsch, who considers that music and philosophy can and should go hand in hand. To this end he has written a work for violin solo, strings, and pianoforte designed to accompany the recitation of pages from Tolstoy. This was performed at the composer's studio on March 6, and proved musically interesting, although it cannot be said to have furthered appreciation of the text. Several performances were announced, each forming part of an attractive 'Concert Intime.' The reciter was Miss Saxby, the pianist Mr. Ioan Lloyd-Powell, and the violinist M. Zacharewitsch.

A Patron's Fund Concert was given at Bechstein Hall on March 7, when attention was chiefly drawn to the powers, not of composers, but of interpretative artists coming under the benefits of the Fund. Some new works, however, were heard. Songs by Malcolm Davidson were given by Miss Clara Serena, and a group by Miss Morfydd Owen were sung by the composer. String works by Mr. Philip Levine were played by the Kinze Quartet. The artists appearing in familiar music were Miss Lilian Stiles-Allen and Mr. Constantine Morris (vocalists), Miss Dorothy de Vin (violinist), and Mr. Arthur Alexander (pianist).

A Barns-Phillips concert, characterized by the usual high endeavour and attractiveness of programme, took place at Bechstein Hall on March 8.

The Smallwood-Metcalf Choir made two important additions to their repertory for the purposes of their concert at Queen's Hall on March 12. These were Mr. Granville Bantock's 'They that go down to the sea in ships' and Mr. Holbrooke's 'Footsteps of angels.' The programme also included, as usual, a selection of madrigals and other old music. The soloists of the occasion were Mr. W. H. Squire (violinist), and Miss Phyllis Finch and Mr. Roland Jackson (vocalists).

Miss Ada Thomas (pianist) and the Brodsky Quartet gave an interesting concert at Æolian Hall on March 12. The programme included Nováček's E flat Quartet and César Franck's Pianoforte quintet.

Miss Adila and Jelly von Arányi gave an admirable performance of Spohr's Duo for two violins in D minor as an opening to their concert at Æolian Hall on March 14. Songs were sung with refinement by Mr. Roland Jackson.

RECITALS.

Madame Nathalie Aktzery, a Russian soprano singer of great vocal charm and expressive power, gave a recital at Æolian Hall on February 20, in the course of which the whole development of French song was illustrated. A second recital, on March 6, similarly illustrated Russian song.

Miss Marian Jay, a violinist who excels in the older schools of violin music, was heard at Bechstein Hall on February 21 in a programme largely devoted to Bach. Brahms's D minor Sonata was also admirably played. Miss Ada Thomas assisted at the pianoforte.

Mr. Egon Petri again revealed a wonderful technique and far-reaching powers of interpretation, when he gave a pianoforte recital at Bechstein Hall on February 22.

Messrs. Philip and Bewlay Cathie, violinist and pianist, introduced 'A poem of Spring,' by Mr. Ernest Austin, in giving their recital at Steinway Hall on February 26. It is imaginative and individual music.

Three attractive songs by Herr Weingartner were sung by Dr. Theo. Lierhammer in the course of his recital at Bechstein Hall on March 5. Miss Lily Fairney, also a vocalist, assisted, and was well received.

M. Busoni is supreme among pianists when he is able to beautify music, such as Liszt's B minor Sonata, in which beauty is not uppermost, and in this way his recent recital of Liszt's music, referred to in our last issue, was more astonishing than the Chopin recital that he gave at Queen's Hall on March 12. Nevertheless his Chopin playing was extraordinarily fascinating, and its strength was always tempered to the right degree.

Recitals have also been given by Miss Onah Sumner (violin), Miss Rhoda Simpson (violin), Miss Leila Doubleday (violin), Madame Beatrice Langley (violin), Miss Rosina Buckmann (vocalist) and Mr. Philip Cathie (violinist), Madame Frickenhaus (pianist), Mr. Wilfrid Platt (vocalist), Miss Irene Scharrer (pianist), Miss Nicole Anckier (harpist), Mr. E. B. Appleyard (pianist), Miss Lotte Liess (vocalist), Miss Catherine Rosser (vocalist), Mr. Howard-Jones (pianist), Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Hobday (violinist and pianist), Miss Florence Greenwood (pianist), Miss May Bartlett and Madame Marie Dockray (violinist and vocalist), Miss Monique Poole (violinist), Miss Eileen Craig (violinist), Miss Isolde Menges (violinist).

Suburban Concerts.

German's 'Merrie England' was given in concert form by the Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union on February 20, under the direction of Mr. E. Stanley Roper.

A highly-creditable performance of Elgar's 'The dream of Gerontius' was given on February 25 by the Twickenham Philharmonic Society, under the capable direction of Mr. Arthur Cowen. The tone of the choral singing was good in both quality and mass, and the expression adequate to the great demands made upon the choir. A capable semi-chorus of eight was obtained, and good orchestral assistance was given. The solo parts were taken by Miss Palgrave Turner, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The concert opened with Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony.

Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' was creditably performed by the Dulwich Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Julius Harrison, at the Crystal Palace, on March 8. The solo parts were taken by Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Gladys Palmer, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Julien Henry. Max Bruch's G minor Violin concerto was played by M. Anton Maaskoff. The interest of novelty was lent to the occasion by the first performance of a choral and orchestral setting of 'Young Lochinvar,' written by the prominent young Welsh musician, Mr. Cyril Jenkins. The subject is treated ably and with interesting musical ideas, and the writing—both choral and orchestral—shows considerable mastery.

The 'Lighthouse' P.S.A. Orchestra, Walthamstow, gave an excellent concert on March 10, under the direction of Mr. R. P. Mitchell. The programme included Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Weber's 'Euryanthe' Overture, Janfeldt's 'Preludium,' other instrumental works and solo numbers. The orchestra consists of nearly fifty members, all amateurs.

The 214th Smoking Concert of the South London Musical Club took place on Tuesday, March 11, at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, the president, Mr. Frederick Henry, being in the chair. The bulk of the programme was (as usual) made up of choral numbers for men's voices, Grieg's 'Landerkenning' and three part-songs—composed for and dedicated to the South London Musical Club by F. Cunningham Woods—being the principal features. Mr. Woods, who was present, received an ovation at the conclusion of his two 'Songs of the Sea,' entitled 'A coarse morning,' and 'Wind and sea.' Under the inspiring beat of Mr. H. L. Balfour, the choir gave a good account of themselves in spite of a shortage of altos. The Club will hold its annual dinner at the Holborn Restaurant on Saturday, April 19, when Mr. William Johnson Galloway, hon. musical director of the Great Eastern Railway Musical Society, will take the chair.

Sir Edward Elgar's 'King Olaf' was performed by the Wimbledon Hill Choral Society on March 12, at the Lecture Hall. Miss Whitfield conducted. The voices were accompanied by a dozen strings, Madame Vaughan being at the pianoforte. Mrs. G. H. Todd, Mr. A. A. Pearson, and Mr. Humphrey Ryde were the soloists.

The Ealing Choral and Orchestral Society recently gave an Elgar concert, under the direction of Mr. Albert Thompson. The chief work selected was 'King Olaf,' which was finely performed by a choir and orchestra of 200. The orchestral numbers were the second 'Wand of youth' suite, the Prelude to the 'Dream of Gerontius,' and a Pomp and Circumstance March. Songs were given by Miss Carrie Lanceley, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Herbert Heyner, who also took the solo parts in the cantata.

Music in the Provinces.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

A pianoforte recital was given by Mr. Herbert Parsons at the Queen's College on February 18, in place of the Catterall Chamber Concert, the principal feature of the programme being Liszt's Sonata in B minor. The pianist was in excellent form and never played better.

The evening following, the Birmingham Victoria Male Choir gave a miscellaneous concert in the Town Hall in aid of the Children's Hospital, but unfortunately the attendance was very poor, and it is doubtful if the charity will at all benefit by it. Under Mr. W. E. Robinson's direction the choir performed a number of part-songs with commendable tone-power, precision, and even-balance. Songs were contributed by Madame Laura Taylor and Mr. James Round, the only instrumental interludes being some violin solos played with brilliance by Mr. Arthur Hytch. The accompanist was Dr. Rowland Winn.

The Birmingham Festival Choral Society's third concert of the current series took place at the Town Hall on February 20, when Mozart's Requiem Mass and Bach's Christmas Oratorio, Parts 1 and 2, were performed under Dr. Sinclair's watchful direction, the principals who took part being Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Robert Radford. The revival of these works was certainly of considerable interest, inasmuch as it is many years since they were given in Birmingham, and to many present they must have been novelties. The performance, especially of the Requiem, was certainly poignant and deeply emotional, the singing of the choir being characterized by great unanimity and beauty of tone as well as earnestness of purpose. The voices of the solo quartet blended admirably, and most adequate support was rendered in both works by Mr. C. W. Perkins, our city organist.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association's fine performance of Sir Edward Elgar's cantata 'King Olaf,' not given by this Society before, took place at the Town Hall on February 22, the work having been quite admirably prepared by Mr. Joseph H. Adams, who conducted. The whole cantata, which conveys a truly dramatic tone-picture of uncommon attractiveness, was followed by the large audience with keen interest, and, considering the difficulties, the interpretation was on the whole quite praiseworthy, and rarely has one heard here more beautiful singing in the unaccompanied chorus 'As torrents in summer.' Excellent service was rendered by the principal artists, Miss Euneta Truscott, Mr. Henry Turpenney, and Mr. Thomas Howell. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character, the novelty being Coleridge-Taylor's last orchestral composition, 'Dream Dances.'

A song recital was given in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on February 24 by Madame Jessie Brett Young (née Hankinson), a pupil of Sir Henry Wood, assisted by Mr. Clarence Raybould at the pianoforte. The programme principally comprised German Lieder. Madame Brett Young's voice is a soprano of considerable volume, over which she has complete control, and she also possesses plenty of temperament.

The Birmingham Philharmonic Society's last concert of the series of four was given in the Town Hall on February 26, conducted by Mr. Landon Ronald. It was the best attended of the series, and one of the most enjoyable, although no novelty was forthcoming. The principal orchestral works were Beethoven's seventh Symphony and Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations, both given with exhilarating freshness. Mr. Percy Grainger delighted everyone with his performance of Grieg's Pianoforte concerto.

The Birmingham Choral Union's concert-performance of Edward German's opera 'Merrie England' attracted a large popular audience to the Town Hall on March 1. Mr. Richard Wassell, the new conductor, is making his personality strongly felt in the way he is training the choir and the way he directs the concerts, and certainly great things may be expected from him in the future, for he is an earnest and painstaking musician. The whole performance was bright and full of colour, and the principals too were quite good, comprising Miss Eva Rich, Madame Marguerite Gell, Miss Cecilia Inniss, Mr. Sam Hemphill, and Mr. Sidney Stoddard.

At the last Harrison Concert, given in the Town Hall on March 3, the Queen's Hall Orchestra played under the direction of Sir Henry Wood, and the vocalist was Miss Maggie Teyte. An excellent popular concert was given by the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra at the Town Hall on March 8, under Mr. Julian Clifford's conductorship. The conductor also appeared as solo pianist, giving a fine and flawless performance of Saint-Saëns's fifth Concerto—one that is but rarely heard. Mr. Max Mossel's last concert of the season was given in the Grosvenor Room, Grand Hotel, on March 6. The novelty was Vogrich's symphonic composition, 'Memento Mori,' for violin and pianoforte, of which Mr. Max Mossel gave an expressive reading. The solo pianist was Miss Adela Verne, and the vocalist Madame Tilly Koenen. Mr. G. H. Manton was the accompanist.

BOURNEMOUTH.

Activity with respect to matters musical has by no means been arrested by the advent of the Lenten season; there has been no decrease in the number or quality of the concerts, and, in fact, the first week in March was one of the busiest we have experienced.

Capital orchestral playing and programmes of much intrinsic interest have marked the progress of the Symphony Concerts, but, with the exception of Glazounov's eighth Symphony, a very impressive and erudite work, we have not had any new compositions of much value. In addition to the Russian Symphony we have been favoured with two works in that form which represent absolutely conflicting ideals, namely, Berlioz's 'Harold in Italy' (solo viola, Mr. Mauritz Speelman, a member of the orchestra) and the third Symphony of Brahms; and on March 6, the Overture, Scherzo, and Finale by Schumann, which might almost be included among the above, was revived. Of compositions devised on a smaller scale, the most attractive were the three overtures, 'The Magic Flute,' 'In der Natur,' and 'Carneval,' by Mozart, Dvorák, and Glazounov, respectively. At the twenty-second concert of the series, Sir Alexander Mackenzie was present to conduct two of his compositions, and the soloists who have appeared include the names of Mr. Isadore Epstein (Beethoven's Pianoforte concerto in C minor), Miss Grace Triggs (Coleridge-Taylor's Violin concerto), Miss Tora Hwass (Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto, No. 1), and the popular Bournemouth violinist, Mr. Charles Fletcher, who played the Tchaikovsky Concerto.

The Monday 'Pops' do not belie their title, the series being held in high esteem by regular attendants at the Winter Gardens. An exceptionally informing programme was drawn up for the nineteenth concert, the scheme dealing with the evolution of the concert overture, and the items being as follows: 'Die Weihe des Hauses,' by Beethoven, 1822; 'Die Hebrides,' by Mendelssohn, 1832; 'Parisina,' by Sterndale Bennett, 1834; 'Romeo and Juliet,' by Tchaikovsky, 1862; 'Tragic Overture,' by Brahms, 1881; 'In the South,' by Elgar, 1904. The principal details of the remaining concerts are as follows: February 24, Bach-Mozart concert (Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor and Suite for flute and strings, the solo part in the latter being taken by Mr. Jean Gennin, a member of the orchestra; Mozart's 'Don Juan' Overture, Serenade for strings known as 'Ein kleine Nacht-Musik'). March 3, Rhapsody programme, the chief feature being the beautiful Irish Rhapsody by C. V. Stanford. March 10, Slavonic programme ('Carneval' Overture and Symphonic Variations by Dvorák, and two of the 'Mein Vaterland' tone-poems by Smetana). The chamber-music performed at these concerts has consisted of a Quintet for wood-wind and horn by Reicha, played by Messrs. Gennin, Egerton, Onez, Trevisone, and Chapman (all of the Municipal Orchestra), a Sonata for violin and pianoforte by Paul Juon, which received a thoughtful interpretation at the hands of Miss Edie Reynolds and Miss Craigie Ross—the latter artist being one of the ablest performers in the locality—and Mozart's Clarinet quintet, performed by Messrs. H. Onez, F. King-Hall, A. Holland, M. Speelman, and F. Dunworth, members of the orchestra.

Of those artists who have already reached a position of eminence and those who are now persevering to that end, we have had visits from Ernst von Lengyel and Joska Szigeti (Bach-Beethoven-Brahms recital), Melsa (orchestral concert), Wladimir Cernikoff (orchestral concert), Johannes Wolff and party, Kreisler (orchestral concert), Miss Lena Ashwell in recitations, and Miss Ellen Bowick (recitations with orchestra). Dr. Markham Lee is continuing his series of lectures, the subjects of his discourses during the past month being 'Johannes Brahms' and 'Tchaikovsky.' Reference must be made to the emphatic success of Sir Henry Wood in his direction of the Municipal Orchestra at the latter's benefit concert; the financial results of this function were very gratifying to those desirous of showing their esteem for our hard-working instrumentalists.

As a result, no doubt, of Mr. Dan Godfrey's exertions and enthusiasm, the combined Municipal Choir and Orchestra gave a first-rate performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' on March 5, our talented conductor revealing marked ability as an interpreter of choral music. The choir sang the familiar choruses with striking effect, the purity of tone being particularly noticeable, and the solos were allotted to such experienced vocalists as Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. Sam Hempsall, and Mr. Thorpe Bates, the last-named presenting us with a highly dramatic and very expressive reading of the Prophet's music.

BRISTOL.

On February 22 the Bristol Choral Society, under the able direction of Mr. George Riseley, gave a concert at Colston Hall, in honour of the memory of Coleridge-Taylor, the compositions selected being the first two parts of 'Hiawatha' and 'A tale of Old Japan.' These were most effectively interpreted by a choir and orchestra numbering 500. The solo parts were entrusted to Miss Carrie Tubb, Mrs. Gertrude Winchester, Mr. Morgan Kingston, and Mr. Frederic Austin. A large audience gave repeated proofs that the concert was appreciated.

Those capable players known as the Clifton Quintet gave another of their agreeable concerts on February 24 at the Victoria Rooms, and charmed by the excellent manner in which they played Schubert's Quartet in D minor and Brahms's Quartet in A major (Op. 25).

Mr. Hubert Hunt's chamber concert at the Victoria Rooms on March 3 afforded illustrations of Beethoven's three styles in the Quartet in B flat major (Op. 18, No. 6), Trio in D major (Op. 70, No. 1), and Quartet in C sharp minor (Op. 131). The playing of Mr. Hubert Hunt and Miss K. Tudor Pole (violins), Miss Gladys Home (viola), Mr. Roger Bucknall (violinello), and Mrs. McWilliam (pianoforte), delighted a numerous audience.

On March 3, at the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, Bushey Park, the St. Luke's Choral Society, of which Mr. C. H. Bishop (organist of St. Luke's Church) is conductor, performed Mendelssohn's 'First Walpurgis Night' and a miscellaneous selection in the presence of a large audience.

Avonmouth Choral Society gave a concert in Shirehampton Hall, under the direction of Mr. William Powell, on March 5. Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' was creditably performed, the soloists being Madame Elsa Oswald, Mr. William Ellis, and Mr. Lionel Doré. There was a pianoforte accompaniment supplied by Mr. Hubert Hunt. The second part of the concert was miscellaneous.

On March 12, Bristol Dolphin Male-Voice Choir gratified a large audience in the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, St. James's Square, by the admirable manner in which they delivered some favourite pieces under the direction of Mr. F. H. Simpson. There were also songs by Miss Amy Richards, Miss Marian Neale, Mr. A. E. Montes, and Mr. F. Crombie Frost, and pianoforte pieces by Miss Bertha Simpson.

DEVON AND CORNWALL.

THE THREE TOWNS.

An interesting experiment was made on February 16 by the Male-Voice Choir connected with the Saltash Y.M.C.A. (conductor, Mr. T. Lean), when they gave a sacred concert at the Plymouth Prison, singing choruses and solos which were much appreciated. Mr. Harry Woodward, organist of King Street Wesleyan Church, conducts a juvenile as well as an augmented adult choir, and both have given concerts during the month. The adults, on February 19, sang part-songs by Trevalsa, Barnby, Venables, Macfarren, and others. The juniors showed their powers on March 10.

On February 24, Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir (conductor, Mr. D. Parkes) gave their first performance of Bantock's 'My love is like a red, red rose,' and drew the remainder of an excellent programme from their repertoire. The chief choral event of the month was a performance of high standard by the Plymouth Guildhall Choir, on March 1, of 'The Golden Legend,' in which the excellent balance of parts and careful tone-production resulted in an ensemble of musical and rich quality and sympathetic expression. The principals were the Misses Christine Bywater and Hilda Cragg James, and Messrs. Cynlais Gibbs and William Higley. Mr. Maurice Alexander led the band, and Mr. H. Moreton conducted.

In the series of Corporation concerts the orchestral band of the Royal Marines presented a good programme on February 22 under the conductorship of Mr. J. W. Newton.

OTHER DEVONSHIRE TOWNS.

Loddiswell Choral Society collaborated with the junior contingent on March 6 in their third annual concert, both combinations singing part-songs with creditable effect.

The management of Torquay Pavilion continue their enterprising scheme of high-class music, and in addition to the much-appreciated symphony and other orchestral concerts special events have been visits paid by Messrs. Kreisler and Backhaus. Mr. Basil Hindenberg is the conductor. In the course of their provincial tour Messrs. Ernst von Lengyel and Joska Szigeti have visited Exeter and Torquay.

CORNWALL.

Torpoint Wesleyan Choir gave a concert on February 23, conducted by Mr. C. Broad and assisted by a small orchestra. St. Beoch Quartet (vocal) took part in a concert at St. Teath on March 5, and Camborne Orpheus Quartet, supported by Mr. Paddy (organ), performed on the same date at St. Columb. The Falmouth Adult Male Choir was conducted by Mr. E. E. Howard in an interesting programme at Penryn on March 6, and on the following day Penzance Y.M.C.A. Choir at Marazion sang part-songs excellently under the conductorship of Mr. E. Tregarthen. Plymouth Orpheus Male Choir visited Liskeard on March 12.

The band of the Royal Artillery (Plymouth) gave an excellent concert at the Newquay Pavilion on February 21, conducted by Mr. R. G. Evans, and the same band gave their third symphony concert at Penzance in the afternoon of the same day. The 'Unfinished' was the symphony selected, and pieces by Grieg, Sibelius, and Weber completed the programme. Penzance Independent Band, on March 5, were conducted by Mr. H. Sainsbury in a performance of a popular programme, which proved them to have made much progress during the season's practice.

Performances of 'The Pirates of Penzance' were successfully given on March 4 and 5 by Redruth Amateur Operatic Society, at Penzance. Mr. H. Dennis was musical director, and the chorus-singing was full of vivacity and good rhythm. Mr. Walter Barnes led an excellent orchestra.

DUBLIN.

On March 12 the Dublin Orchestral Society gave a Wagner Centenary Concert under Dr. Esposito's direction. There was a large audience.

The series of four Sunday Orchestral Concerts at Woodbrook Bray finished on March 9. The programmes included Mozart's Symphony in G minor, Schubert's 'Unfinished,' and Beethoven's eighth and fifth Symphonies. The soloists were Miss Nettie Edwards, Mr. J. C. Doyle, Mr. Léon Fastovsky, and Madame Borel (vocalists), and Mr. Clyde Twelveteers (violinellist), Signor Simonetti (violinist), and Dr. Esposito (pianist).

On February 27 the College Choral Society, under Dr. Charles Marchant, gave Bach's 'St. John' Passion. Mr. Alfred Heather and members of the Society were the solo vocalists.

Miss Nora Thomson's String Quartet gave two recitals at the Aberdeen Hall on February 24 and March 5. The players were Miss Nora Thomson, Miss Madeleine Moore, Mr. Harris Rosenberg, and Mr. Clyde Twelvetees. The programmes included Quartets by Beethoven, Mozart, Grieg, and Tchaikovsky (Op. 11). Mr. Percy Whitehead and Mr. Melfort D'Alton were the vocalists, and Mr. J. F. Larchet the accompanist.

In the notice of the forthcoming Feis Ceoil (May 19-24), in last month's issue, the name of Dr. W. H. Grattan Flood should have been included as adjudicator in the Irish Pipes Competition.

EDINBURGH.

In the closing days of February, Edinburgh was the musical centre of gravity in the north of the kingdom, for on February 25 commenced a Beethoven Festival that was organized on such a generous scale that all the Symphonies were performed, as well as a number of smaller works. The Symphonies were given in chronological order, two being played at each of the concerts on February 25, 27, the seventh and the C major Piano-forte concerto being given on February 28, and the eighth and ninth Symphonies, with the Edinburgh Royal Choral Union, on March 1. The orchestra was that of the Hallé Concerts. Mr. Balling conducted, and enhanced his reputation by the strength and musical purity of his interpretations. Musical Edinburgh is by no means starved, but to many this Festival must have been a revelation. The pianist in the Concerto was Mr. Egon Petri, who also played in the Fantasia for piano-forte, choir, and orchestra. The 'Leonora' No. 3 and other Overtures were given in the course of the Festival. In the ninth Symphony, which was very finely performed, the soloists were Madame Louie Fidler, Miss Annie Hargreaves, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Charles Knowles.

On March 11, an interesting evening was provided by Mr. Kirkhope's choir, the programme consisting of Dvorák's 'Spectre's bride' and Gounod's 'Gallia.' The dramatic elements in Dvorák's work were well portrayed, and the fine tone and expressive power characteristic of the choir added to the interest of the interpretation. The soloists of the occasion were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, and Mr. Charles Tree. Good orchestral accompaniment was provided, and in every way the concert was an artistic and popular success.

An interesting concert was given by Mr. Little's choir at the Oak Hall on March 13. Part-songs and madrigals were sung in finished style, and there was good solo-singing by Miss Peggy Mitchell, Mrs. Langlands, and Miss Ellen White.

The events of the month also included a visit by the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Sir Henry Wood.

GLASGOW.

With the exception of a fortnight's performances by the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company and a Harrison Concert by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood, local effort has wholly provided the month's music. The annual concert of the Glee and Madrigal Society, conducted by Mr. B. W. Hartley, took place on February 24. The programme presented no new features. The University Choral Society gave a very successful concert on March 3. The interpretation of a judiciously-selected and well-contrasted programme of part-songs, &c., was the best we have yet heard from the student-chorists. Notably was this the case in such unaccompanied numbers as madrigals by Costeley and Orlando di Lassus, and a motet by Tchaikovsky. Vocal solos sung by Miss Jenny Young and Mr. Maurice D'Oisly contributed much to the enjoyment of the concert, and Mr. A. M. Henderson, the University organist, in addition to his duties as conductor and accompanist, played two groups of piano-forte solos. The annual concert of the Teachers' Choral Society was given on March 7, the programme including Gounod's 'Gallia,' Gade's 'The Erl-King's daughter,' and part-songs. Under the skilful guidance of the new conductor, Mr. H. S. Munro, the choir have made such a decided advance that they seem a totally different body from what they were some years ago. Their singing was throughout marked by clear enunciation, fine phrasing, and praiseworthy accuracy and expression. The Orpheus Choir (Mr. H. S. Robertson) gave their second concert for the season on March 11, when they fully maintained the reputation they have gained as exponents of the 'new choralism.' In a most exacting programme of fourteen choral pieces—sung entirely from memory—the singing was excellent, but in Cornelius's eight-part motet, 'The surrender of the soul to the Everlasting Love,' the choir achieved their greatest success. Mr. Jose de Moraes was solo vocalist and Miss Kathleen Parlow solo violinist, both being artistically accompanied on the piano-forte by Mr. Wilfrid Senior. On the same evening an enjoyable concert was given by Mr. R. Hutton Malcolm's Male-Voice Choir. The outstanding merit of Mr. Malcolm's programmes is their freshness, and on the present occasion, if we except Dudley Buck's 'In absence,' Mendelssohn's 'The hunter's farewell,' and a solo and chorus from Elgar's 'Coronation Ode,' all the pieces sung were quite unfamiliar. The choral singing was pleasingly varied by solos given by Miss Jean Gibson, Mr. T. Wallace, and Mr. R. Hutton Malcolm. It must suffice to mention merely the Bach Choir's annual performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion in the Cathedral. The choir, under Mr. J. M. Diack, were assisted by the boys from Paisley Abbey Choir, and Mr. Gervase Elwes was chief soloist. Mr. Herbert Walton was, as usual, a tower of strength at the organ.

GLOUCESTER.

The last concert of the Gloucester Choral Society's fifty-second season was given at the Shire Hall, on February 27. In the arrangement of the programme regard was had to the season of Lent, and the principal work chosen for the performance was the 'Requiem' (Op. 45) of Brahms. The programme further included Handel's Suite for strings, in G minor, 'The night is calm and cloudless,' from Sullivan's 'The Golden Legend,' sung by Miss Mary Sansom, and 'Hiawatha's vision' (Coleridge-Taylor), sung by Mr. Dalton Baker. The choir proved to be a very competent body of vocalists. The band, assisted by Mr. A. P. Porter at the organ, and Mr. H. C. Organ at the piano-forte, again performed with distinction. Dr. A. Herbert Brewer as usual conducted, and he had every reason to be gratified with the results, both vocal and instrumental.

For the second concert of the season the Cheltenham Philharmonic Society provided a miscellaneous programme of an attractive character. The soloists were Madame Gleeson-White, who is an established favourite in Cheltenham, and Mr. Fraser Gange. Both were exceedingly well received. The choir contributed four items with nice balance and good feeling, while the orchestra also played a prominent part. Mr. C. J. Phillips conducted throughout.

LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

Elgar's latest choral work, 'The Music Makers,' composed for the Birmingham Festival of October, 1912, was performed for the first time in Liverpool at the tenth concert of the Philharmonic Society on February 18. Conducted by Sir Frederic Cowen the work made an excellent impression. The contralto solo was sung by Miss Phyllis Lett. The performance of Mozart's 'Requiem' was by comparison ineffective. It never exhibited the requisite exaltation of spirit, although there was a superabundance of material force. Songs by Miss Perceval Allen and Mr. Morgan Kingston were supplemented by four attractive movements from Glazounov's 'Les Ruses d'Amour.'

At the eleventh Philharmonic Concert on March 4 the playing of Mr. Alfred Cortot in Saint-Saëns's fourth Piano-forte concerto in C minor, and especially in Liszt's second 'Rhapsodie Hongroise,' aroused high enthusiasm. Sir Frederic Cowen conducted a fine performance of César Franck's noble Symphony in D minor, and his own part-songs, 'Evening brings us home' and 'June,' together with the artistic singing of Mr. Theodore Byard, were other outstanding features.

At the second concert of the Societa Armonica, given on March 1, under the direction of Mr. Akeroyd, the programme contained Beethoven's C minor Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Piano-forte concerto (Op. 30) in one movement, which, apart from its musical interest, gave opportunity for the display of Mr. Douglas Miller's fluent technique and temperamental gift. Besides Mr. Balfour Gardiner's 'Overture to a Comedy,' another example of native worth was the 'Spinning Song' from Dr. E. W. Naylor's Ricordi prize-opera 'The Angelus,' attractively sung by Miss Emily Breare. Mr. Akeroyd conducted.

The Lord Mayor, Mr. Harmood Banner, M.P., presided at the twelfth annual meeting of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, which was held in the Town Hall on March 3, and the Lord Bishop and Sir Edward Russell were among the speakers. The accounts of the recent Festival, which were presented by Mr. Ralph H. Baker, the indefatigable hon. sec., showed a deficit of £5, the receipts being £264 against outgoings of £269. Of the series of twelve Festivals six have resulted in surpluses and six in deficits. But the importance and usefulness of this great annual effort are not solely measured by the financial results, although it is hoped to effect certain economies in the ensuing Festival to be held in December.

An excellent performance of Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle' was given in the Philharmonic Hall on February 19. It reflected great credit on the conductor, Madame Fanny de Boufflers, whose command over her choral and orchestral forces was natural and firm. The choir was made up of her Liverpool Ladies' Choir, a numerous and well-trained force, supplemented by the male voices of the Liverpool Vocal Union, and an orchestra of sixty led by Mr. Rimmer with Mr. Branscombe at the organ. Madame Annie Goodwin, Mr. Lloyd Moore, and Mr. Ralph Smith were the vocal principals.

Mr. Percy Harrison's season terminated brilliantly on March 5, when the Queen's Hall Orchestra, conducted by Sir Henry Wood, gave a notable exhibition of what human skill and art can accomplish in an orchestra when directed by a master-mind. There was no symphony, but there were several new pieces, including the love-music from Strauss's 'Feuersnot.' The lively rhythms of Gardiner's clever 'Shepherd Fennel's Dance' and Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris' compelled instant favour, and the singing of Miss Maggie Teyte completed a delightful programme.

At their third concert on March 8 the Brodsky Quartet introduced their String quartet in E flat by Nováček, a Czech composer whose national characteristics are apparent, although here confined to more or less definite form. Nováček, who died a few years ago at an early age, was formerly one of Dr. Brodsky's pupils in Leipsic, and later he became viola-player in the Brodsky Quartet. Schumann's Sonata in A minor, Op. 105, for violin and piano-forte, and Mozart's Quintet No. 7, in D, completed the programme.

Among recent events worthy of passing note were Miss Edina Thraves's annual Students' Concert on February 22, when this accomplished singer and teacher was assisted by Mr. John Lawson (violin), Mr. Josef Greene (solo piano-forte), and Mr. George Barnett (tenor). The concert of the Cymric Vocal Union, on March 8, was also interesting to those who appreciate a first-class male-voice choir and part-singing of a cultivated kind. This fine choir of men, conducted by Mr. J. T. Jones, has maintained a high reputation for many years. Miss Emily Breare contributed artistic songs. At the Orchestral Concert of the Sunday Society, which Mr. John Lawson conducted in St. George's Hall on March 9, an interesting item was Mr. J. H. Foulds's 'Keltic Suite,' which, although not based upon actual folk-tunes, is effectively suggestive of their influence. Mr. Albert Chapman (vocalist) and Mr. Robert Klass (solo violin) also took part in a popular programme, the eclectic nature of which was illustrated by the choice of the hymn, 'Onward, Christian soldiers,' and the Overture to 'Zampa' as the opening numbers.

Speaking at the Royal Institution on 'The need of a Welsh National College of Music,' Mr. Harry Evans made an eloquent appeal on behalf of the movement which was commenced by himself, based on his experience of the remarkable unity amongst the Welsh people in the formation of the huge choir of six thousand at the Crystal Palace in September, 1911. Wales suffered a good deal from lack of competent teachers. Of ill-equipped teachers there were all too many. The country had been for years the happy hunting-ground of bogus institutions that granted worthless diplomas and certificates. There was no central institution to guide and control the various forces. He advocated the establishment of a National School of Music devoted entirely to the art, having expert teachers in all branches, and a principal whose personality could and would inspire the young Welsh musicians. Such a centre would, he believed, give them a composer who would be known beyond the confines of his native land.

Dr. A. W. Pollitt, on March 1, lectured before the Guild of Education in the Arts Theatre of the University on 'Some aspects of the work of Johannes Brahms,' the treatment of the subject being made additionally interesting by choral examples. Mr. A. E. Workman delivered his popular lecture, 'Opera, its origin and development,' with vocal illustrations, before the Wesley Guild at Hoylake, on March 12.

At the ninth concert of the Rodewald Concert Club, on February 24, a chamber concert was provided by Mr. Naum Blinder (violin), Mr. Charles Kelly (piano-forte), and Miss Myra Dixon (vocalist). At the tenth and closing concert, on March 10, Brahms's Trio in E flat, for piano-forte, violin, and horn, was delightfully played by Miss Marguerite Stilwell, Mr. Alfred Ross, and Mr. F. Paersch, and Miss Edina Thraves sang two groups of contrasted Lieder with versatility of style and evident acceptance. The Club has taken a recognised place in the city's musical life.

The Moody-Manners Opera Company appeared at the Theatre Royal, Birkenhead, and gave successful performances during their fortnight's visit. Great interest is aroused by the approaching first performances in Liverpool of Wagner's 'Ring' in English, which Mr. Quinlan has arranged to give in the Royal Court Theatre in May.

Dr. W. B. Brierley conducted, on February 25, an excellent performance of Stanford's 'Phauidrig Crohoore' and Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' given by the West Kirby Choral Society with orchestra. The vocal principals were Miss Louie James, Miss Annie Hargreaves, Mr. Frank Webster, Mr. George Parker, and Mr. S. Mann. For their concert on March 13, the thriving Walton Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Albert Orton, sang Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion' and Gade's 'Spring's message,' and on the same evening the Ormskirk Musical Association, an excellent organisation numbering 120 in band and choir, performed the 'Messiah.' Mr. John Ball conducted, and the principal singers were Madame Moffitt, Miss Iredale, Mr. Horace Binks, and Mr. Norman Allin.

After an interval of five years, the Welsh Choral Union, conducted by Mr. Harry Evans, gave a second performance of Elgar's oratorio 'The Apostles' in the Philharmonic Hall on March 15. A great work of this calibre especially appeals to this finely organized choral body, and their singing was again marked by refinement and delicacy alternating with sheer power and dramatic force. Very careful preparation of the difficult music was evident, and the orchestral interpretation was no less effective. The oratorio was followed with absorbed interest by an immense audience, who refrained from applause until the end of each part. Miss Muriel Foster sang the music of Mary Magdalene with conspicuous art, although evidently feeling the effects of recent indisposition. The other principals included Miss Edith McCullagh, who sang excellently, Mr. John Booth (St. John), Mr. Ivor Foster (Jesus), Mr. George Baker (St. Peter), and Mr. Herbert Brown repeated his remarkably fine interpretation of the part of Judas.

Mr. A. W. Speed conducted an impressive performance of Elgar's 'The Apostles' in the splendid new church of Holy Trinity, Southport, on March 14, when there was a band and choir of 150 with Mr. C. Kingsley Killip at the organ. The vocal principals were Miss Edith McCullagh, Miss Maud Wright, Mr. R. A. Chadwick, Mr. John Booth, Mr. George Baker, and Mr. Herbert Brown.

The twenty-fifth annual Festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union will take place at the Crystal Palace on July 3. Mr. Frank Idle has been appointed hon. conductor, his deputies being Mr. Granville Humphreys, Mr. Sharlands, and Mr. J. Rowley. Mr. J. A. Meale will act as organist.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

At the close of his first season it may be not inappropriate to attempt an estimate of Balling as a conductor. Prior to his residence here we knew him only as a Wagnerian, and experience during the past half-year, culminating in 'Parsifal' at the twentieth concert on March 13, has merely confirmed the very widespread feeling that on this side of his art he is no unworthy successor even to Hans Richter. In other directions certain tolerably well-defined tendencies have been observable. He is an inveterate tempo rubato conductor; in all his work one is conscious of a vitalizing energy, affecting tone, rhythm, and general conception of music alike. Haydn and Mozart are handled in this way as well as Strauss or Reger—and this occasional lack of discrimination in the application of a generally sound principle has been rather surprising in one who has displayed such conspicuous discernment in the Wagnerian epics. Probably it would be unfair to hold him answerable for the inclusion of such incomparably weak symphonic works as Raff's 'Im Walde,' Goldmark's 'Rustic wedding,' or Haydn's 'Military'; although his full schemes have not been carried out according to original intentions, he has done much to appease the former dissatisfaction existing among the not inconsiderable body of progressives in this city. He would appear to have a powerful bias in favour of the modern schools. Certainly what he has played from Brahms, Liszt, Strauss, Elgar, and Reger must be accounted amongst his finest work this season; on Bach and Beethoven Manchester's judgment is—perhaps wisely—reserved. His introduction of timed concert programmes bespeaks the methodical mind; his advocacy of extra sectional and combined rehearsals, of a weekly wage for the bandsmen, of the need for an immediately increased guarantee-fund, are all assured factors in the situation as affecting the next season. There is a certain engaging candour about him and his admissions, such as a declaration that he had only heard 'Elijah' once, twenty-seven years ago, and had never conducted it before last November; then he wanted to acknowledge in the Press responsibility for a bad blunder in a chorus of the Brahms 'Requiem.' Facts like these, and kindly consideration for his players' comfort, have speedily placed him on the friendliest footing with band and choir. So far there has been only occasional evidence of that subtle, more-easily-recognised-than-defined magnetic control of band by conductor, such as one invariably feels when a man of outstanding personality is in charge. Possibly this peculiar responsiveness will develop more slowly with Balling than with some others that occur to one's mind; quite possibly, too, it may prove that at the present juncture in Manchester's musical development, his services to that cause have been most valuable in directions other than that of conductor.

The most notable Hallé orchestral works during the month include Max Reger's 'Lustspiel' Overture, César Franck's D minor Symphony (last heard ten years ago), and Hamilton Harty's 'Wild Geese' Tone-poem (conducted by the composer). In some quarters the Franck Symphony created quite one of the season's sensations, and its warm reception as compared with its first performance showed how far public taste and appreciation have travelled even in such a comparatively short period. Manchester has quite taken Reger to its heart, and even his Psalm c. would find attention and appreciation here. Hamilton Harty was soon on good terms both with band and audience. The final section, with its suggestion of ocean's surge, hardly came up to the expectations roused by a perusal of the analytical notes. Whilst the Hallé band was doing a Beethoven 'starring' tour in Scotland, on February 27 we were regaled with song-recitals by Miss Agnes Nicholls (substituting owing to Miss Muriel Foster's severe illness) and Mr. Robert Radford, Miss Kontorovich and Mr. Frederic Dawson playing solos and displaying only partial understanding in César Franck's A major Sonata for pianoforte and violin. At the February 20 Hallé concert Miss Münthe-Kaas's singing of Grieg songs (with deliciously-played orchestral accompaniments) brought almost a new note into our musical life; her perfect art in her countryman's work was not revealed so fully in other solos.

Both series of Saturday night 'Proms.' have finished up in great style. They have 'caught on,' and the only 'fly in the ointment' is the fear lest this eagerness for orchestral work is being obtained at the expense of other forms—say, chamber-music, which has only received moderate patronage this season. Already the Spelman series have fixed up a visit next season from Granville Bantock; we may be sure that Brand Lane will make a brave response to any and all challenges.

The concluding Harrison concert followed more than usual the conventional 'ballad' concert type; Miss Teyte's singing of Debussy, Duparc, and Bizet confirmed advance news as to her individual interpretative powers, but hardly fulfilled expectations on the vocal side. We shall be glad to welcome Nikisch again next season at this series. Fuller consideration of Balling's production of Acts 1 and 3 of 'Parsifal' must be deferred.

An aspect of Manchester's musical life during the past winter, which cannot be overlooked in any adequate survey of the position, has been the popular attendances, often at what would appear to be most inconvenient hours, of organ recitals at the Cathedral, Town Hall, and University. One good result flowing from the long residence in our midst of the veteran J. Kendrick Pyne is to be noted in the invariably high quality of organ music played by visiting recitalists; yet still we hear no programmes containing so large a proportion of genuine organ music as those played by Dr. Pyne himself.

Miss Say Ashworth annually affords the Manchester public an opportunity of estimating the progress of the three girls' and young women's choirs conducted by her in Manchester and Salford; how far she has succeeded in making these hearty mill-lasses into capable musical artists was nowhere more clearly shown than when they were associated with Sir Henry Wood in Debussy's 'Blessed Damozel.' She would appear to have set her ambitions recently on the acquirement of solo-singing by her girls that shall be as distinguished as their choral work.

The concerts conducted by Dr. Bairstow on March 12 and 14 in Preston and Blackburn respectively, were amongst the most important in Lancashire outside Manchester or Liverpool. Once again the assistance mutually rendered by the choral Societies in these towns has made practicable the otherwise impossible production of Act 1 of 'Parsifal' and Act 3 of 'Meistersinger.' Though falling considerably short, as must all concert-platform performances, of even reasonably high ideals, there was yet much to gratify both promoters and public. Messrs. Julien Henry and Robert Radford both displayed exceptional aptitude for such work as falls to Amfortas, Beckmesser, and Hans Sachs.

On March 10, also in Blackburn, Mr. Gustav von Holst conducted a selection from his own compositions for female voices, Mr. Frank Duckworth's Ladies' Choir having prepared a programme which usefully served the purpose of showing the composer's advance in style and power during the last five years. Group 3 of the 'Rig-Veda' hymns with harp accompaniment stands out as prominently among recent contributions to the library of female-voice work, as did Mr. von Holst's 'Beni Mora' orchestral suite at Birmingham in January last.

At Mr. Charles Risegari's Philharmonic Society, at Bolton, on March 12, Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony and Hamish MacCunn's 'Land of the Mountain and Flood' were performed, Dr. Harford Lloyd's festival motet, 'The righteous live for evermore,' being the principal choral work. Mr. Herbert Whittaker's Bolton Choral Union, like his Manchester Vocal Society, appear to devote themselves assiduously to the cultivation of purely alla cappella work, with undoubted artistic success and satisfaction to their respective patrons.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE AND DISTRICT.

The most important recent event has been the first production here of Beethoven's 'Missa Solemnis' by the Choral Union, on Wednesday, March 12. The choir attacked the stupendous work without fear, and gave a brilliant performance, the soprano line in particular exhibiting unflinching energy and certainty in their almost superhuman task. The Gloria stood out as the most noteworthy feature of the choral-singing, the quick portions being delivered with great impetuosity. Dr. Coward's reading of the score emphasised the joyous side more than the devotional and reflective. The soloists were Miss Emily Breare, Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. H. Turnpenney, and Mr. Hamilton Harris, and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra was engaged. The appreciation of the work on the part of many of the public was much assisted by an eloquent lecture delivered on the Mass a few days before the concert by the president of the Society, Principal Hadow. Excerpts from each movement were sung by a small body of singers, and were warmly received by the crowded audience. Other choral concerts have been two performances of 'Elijah,' one on March 5 by the Newcastle Harmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. E. L. Bainton, and the other by the Sunderland Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. N. Kilburn; and the annual function of the Armstrong College Society, which gave Schumann's 'Faust,' part 3, Stanford's 'Phauidrig Crohoore,' and some unaccompanied folk-songs. The Brussels and the Walenn Quartets, at the concerts of the Chamber Music Society on February 28 and March 10, both followed the custom of playing a Quartet by Haydn. A departure from this tradition would be welcomed by many lovers of chamber-music: there are many of Beethoven's middle and later Quartets which rarely receive a hearing, and many more modern works which would be acceptable. The former combination played an early Beethoven and a Borodin, and the latter a Dvorák Quartet in addition to the sacrificial offering. The committee was fortunate in the choice of vocalists for both occasions, Miss Fifiine de la Cote promising to be a future favourite and Miss Phyllis Lett being an established one. The closing concert of the Classical Concert Society was provided by Miss Marjorie Hayward, Mr. E. Mason, and Mr. Thomas Dunhill, who gave excellent performances of Hurlstone's G major Trio, Bridge's Fantasy in C minor, and Beethoven's Op. 1, No. 3. The first- and last-named joined in Mr. Dunhill's pleasing Sonata for violin and pianoforte. Miss Lillie Chipp, a Newcastle lady who has been studying at the Royal College of Music, gave a promising vocal recital on March 3. The Northumberland Amateur Orchestral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. C. Horsley, gave a well-attended concert, which unfortunately clashed with that of the Classical Concert Society.

The Philharmonic Orchestra gave a neatly-balanced programme on March 13, and showed a further increase in technical skill. The programme included Beethoven's fifth Symphony, Schumann's 'Genoveva' Overture, Borodin's 'On the Steppes,' Debussy's 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune,' and a frank, tuneful Suite by the conductor, Mr. E. L. Bainton, founded on Ruskin's 'The king of the golden river.'

The Carl Rosa Opera Company began a week's season on March 10, and produced for the first time Wolf-Ferrari's opera 'The jewels of the Madonna' (a much greater service to music) revived Mozart's 'Magic Flute.' Mr. van Noorden's conducting in the latter opera was a piece of fine skill, and he secured a delightful orchestral interpretation, which was balanced by a well-chosen and capable cast. A full theatre received the revival with enthusiasm.

A regrettable omission from these notes last month was a reference to the praiseworthy performance of 'The Creation' by the Free Church Choir Union on February 12, under the skilful direction of Mr. George Dodds.

The last of the Harrison series, which took place on March 6, was a visit of the Queen's Hall Orchestra and Sir Henry Wood, who played a large number of varied items ranging from Bach to Ravel. Miss Maggie Teyte made a welcome first appearance here.

NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The Long Eaton Orchestral Society gave their second concert of the season on February 25, when the programme included Mozart's 'Magic Flute' Overture, two movements from Beethoven's fifth Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's 'Nutcracker' Suite. The vocal pieces were ably and artistically sung by Miss Esta d'Argo and Mr. Charles Tree, the accompaniments were supplied by Miss Emily Roseblade, and Mr. Fred Mountney's work as conductor was largely responsible for the success of the performance.

On February 27, the second orchestral concert, given by the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society, proved a great success. The most prominent feature was the performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, which showed a marked improvement in its presentation, and for which Mr. Allen Gill was warmly and heartily recalled. Considering how largely the purely amateur element is in evidence, the playing of the second movement was a remarkable performance. Weber's overture to 'Freischütz,' Wagner's overture to the 'Meistersingers,' Sibelius's 'Valse Triste,' and Elgar's March, 'Pomp and Circumstance,' completed the programme. As vocalist Miss Alice Baxter received a hearty welcome, especially for her singing of Landon Ronald's 'Adonais.'

Great interest was taken in the visit of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood, on March 4. For the most part the programme was modern and largely novel to our local audience, but one of the most enthusiastically received numbers was Bach's Aria from the second Suite in D. The pianist was Mr. Ernest Hutcheson, who gave a fine performance of MacDowell's second Pianoforte concerto. Other items included the 'Peer Gynt' Suite (Grieg) and Wagner selections, Percy Grainger's 'Mock Morris,' and Enesco's 'Roumanian Rhapsody.' The performance was one which will long be remembered in this city.

The third Charity Subscription Concert took place on March 6, when a very acceptable programme was given by Madame Donalds, Miss Carmen Hill, Mr. Frederick Ranalow, Madame Renée Chemet, and the boy pianist, Solomon.

The Long Eaton Choral Society gave a successful performance of Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' on March 11, when the soloists were Miss Doris Carter, Miss Maude Wright, Mr. Gwynne Davies, and Mr. David Brazell. Mr. E. Smeeton conducted, and Mr. F. Mountney led the orchestra.

'Elijah' was chosen by the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society for their final concert of the season on March 13. All who took part were in hearty sympathy with the work, and an unusually fine performance was given. The principal solo parts were taken by Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Ivor Walters, and Mr. Herbert Brown. Mr. F. Wyatt was at the organ, and Mr. Allen Gill conducted.

'The Music Makers' (Elgar) was the chief feature of the Loughborough Choral Society's concert on March 12, when the alto solo was given by Miss Lysette Mostyn. Herr Kienle led the orchestra, and the conductor, through whose energy and enthusiasm the work was undertaken, was Mr. Frank Storer.

OXFORD.

There has been a good deal of music here this term, and only the chief concerts can be noticed.

On January 23 and February 6, the Assembly Room of the Town Hall was occupied by Mr. Slocombe and his party for concerts of English and German chamber-music respectively. On January 24, Mr. Harold Bauer gave a thorough exhibition of his masterly style in a pianoforte recital at the Town Hall.

On January 29, an excellent orchestral concert—though on a scale rather smaller than usual—was given in the Town Hall under the auspices of the Musical Club, the principal works being Mozart's Divertimento for two oboes, two bassoons, and two horns, in F major, Beethoven's Violin concerto, the solo part played with the greatest artistic charm by Mr. Achille Simonetti, and a Concerto for three pianofortes and stringed orchestra in C major, by J. S. Bach. Dr. Walker, Mr. F. Shaw, and Mr. H. Ley were the pianists. The Concerto was an exhilarating example of Bach's 'unbuttoned mood.'

On February 4, Busoni gave a pianoforte recital in the Town Hall to a crowded house, this being his first appearance here. His chief items were the 'Thirty-two Variations in C minor' by Beethoven, three Chopin pieces, and Liszt's 'Hungarian' Rhapsody, No. 13. Busoni is indeed a wonderful player, and the audience was roused to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

On February 15 Madame Melba and party gave an afternoon concert in the Town Hall. She was in excellent voice, and the concert was most enjoyable.

On February 25, Sir Walter Parratt, the Professor of Music, gave his usual terminal lecture to an appreciative audience in the Sheldonian Theatre, the subject being the 'Stringed instruments of the orchestra.' The lecture was illustrated by examples played upon the viola d'amore, the violin, and viola da gamba, which were exceedingly interesting. Referring incidentally to the lute, the genial professor, quoting from Mattheson, told his audience that the difficulty of keeping that instrument in playable order was enormous, and that a lute-player, supposing he had lived to be eighty, would probably have spent sixty years in tuning his instrument.

On February 26, in the Town Hall, under the auspices of the Musical Club, the 'Brussels' String Quartet gave a delightful chamber concert, the first item being Schubert's well-known posthumous Quartet in D minor, and the others, Beethoven's String quartet in F minor (Op. 95), and Debussy's Quartet in G minor (Op. 10).

On March 1, Herr Backhaus gave a pianoforte recital in the Town Hall, and Miss Alice Wilna contributed some excellent solo-singing.

On March 5 came the concert of the term in the Town Hall, when the Bach Choir and Choral Society, under the skilful baton of Dr. Allen, gave Brahms's 'Song of the Fates,' Op. 89, Verdi's 'Stabat Mater,' Bach's motet 'Be not afraid,' for double choir unaccompanied, and lastly Nos. 1, 3, 6 and 8 of César Franck's 'Beatitudes.' A more interesting and varied programme could scarcely be designed. Unqualified praise must be awarded both to soloists and choir throughout this somewhat trying concert, the Bach motet especially being remarkably well sung considering its very great difficulties. Everyone, in short, worked with a will, under the watchful conducting of Dr. Allen, in whom the utmost confidence can always be placed. It is a real pleasure to say that we believe this to have been one of the best concerts ever given at Oxford.

The Sunday Evening Concerts at Balliol College have been continued as usual during term under the able direction of Dr. Walker.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The Cliefeld Musical Union by a competent and, at times, brilliant performance of 'The dream of Gerontius,' emphasised the fact that technique follows the pen—the composer compels choral progress. But a little time ago, the Union were singing easy 'Mendelssohn' passably well. Now, thanks to excellent management, the enthusiasm of the singers of North Derbyshire, and the labours of Mr. J. F. Staton, the conductor, they can conquer the technical difficulties of Elgar's famous work and leave a margin for the infusion of artistry and mood. The latter attribute was responsible for the only blot on an otherwise good performance—a too aggressive realism in the chorus of False Spirits. The soloists, Miss Helen Blain, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, and Mr. Greeves Johnson, were almost uniformly successful. The band, although inadequately rehearsed, played the score creditably.

The Barnsley St. Cecilia Society also won success in Elgar under the alert direction of their new conductor, Mr. Joseph Soar. 'King Olaf' is one of the few ideal secular cantatas for a well-equipped Choral Society. The Barnsley singers performed it with a zest which would have had even more pleasurable results had the scarcity of men's voices been less in evidence. 'The challenge of Thor' was their most successful achievement, as 'The Wraith of Odin'—owing to the extremely slow tempo—was their worst. The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Bridge Peters. The orchestra played extremely well.

A performance of the same work at Doncaster under Mr. Sanderson's direction found another South Yorkshire choir in enthusiastic mood. Aided by half-a-hundred choristers from Rotherham, the choir grasped their opportunities with but few lapses from their own high standards. Miss Caroline Hatchard, Mr. Gwynne Davies, and Mr. Frederick Ranałow were the soloists.

The Barnsley Symphony Orchestra gave a concert of music for string orchestra on February 20, with a programme that included Tchaikovsky's 'Élégie,' Op. 38; No. 4 of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Novellette,' and Ernest Austin's Variations on 'The Vicar of Bray.' The latter work was very highly appreciated. Mr. Fred Popplewell was the vocalist of the occasion, and Mr. B. Langdale accompanied.

A serious programme, befitting the close of Lent, was put forward by the Hillsborough Choral Society. Bach's 'Praise the Lord,' Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' and Elgar's '48th Psalm' formed a triple bill any Society might be proud to perform. Mr. Frank Shimeld secured both point and refinement from his choir, who in all save the opening portions of the Bach work sang admirably.

The last Sheffield Promenade Concert included in the programme Schumann's 'Rhenish' Symphony, played with requisite dash and picturesqueness by the orchestra, a long selection from 'Die Meistersinger' (the most successful of their performances), Smetana's descriptive tone-poem 'Vltava,' and works by Humperdinck and Berlioz. Miss Winifred Christie played in Franck's 'Variations Symphoniques' with poetic feeling and a fine sense of tonal beauty and proportion. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted.

Among other events of the month have been successful concerts by the Sheffield Cambrian Choir, conducted by Mr. Poppleton, a concert by the Chapeltown Sacred Harmonic Society ('Hymn of Praise' and Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' conductor, Mr. M. Thompson); a concert by the Hallé Orchestra, under Mr. Balling (César Franck's Symphony); the opening of a new organ costing £2,000, in the Victoria Hall, and the establishment of a Sheffield and District Association of Organists and Choirmasters.

YORKSHIRE.

LEEDS.

In Leeds we have had during the past month two of the most important concerts of the season. On March 5 the Choral Union, increased by a contingent from the Sheffield Choral Union to a choir of over four hundred voices, gave the first performance in Yorkshire of Granville Bantock's 'Atalanta in Calydon.' Considering the exacting nature of the work, for both singers and hearers, it was a happy idea to give it twice over in the course of the evening, and it was noteworthy that on the repetition all concerned, from Dr. Coward downwards, seemed to have a greater confidence, and it went quite brilliantly, the power of this big choir in sustaining the pitch in so long a work being extraordinary. This month this 'Choral Symphony,' which is quite the most remarkable thing in recent British music, is to be given by the Sheffield Society, when, by way of returning the compliment, the Leeds Society will furnish assistance. Certainly Dr. Coward has given no performance quite so satisfying since he assumed conductorship of the Leeds Choral Union.

The other notable choral event has been the production of Bach's B minor Mass on March 12, under Mr. Fricker's direction. The choral singing, especially of the quieter and more sustained portions, was excellent; some of the more brilliant ones seemed slightly hurried, and lost force in consequence. The tremendous Sanctus was very finely sung, and the Crucifixus was intensely impressive. The soloists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Alice Lakin, Messrs F. Mullings, Marsden Williams, and Campbell McInnes. The annual performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion took place in the Leeds Parish church on March 17, under Dr. Bairstow's direction. The organ being under reconstruction, a small but complete orchestra was employed.

The revived Saturday Orchestral Concerts have been pursuing a thoroughly useful and successful progress. On February 22, Miss Ella Child played with great dash the solo part in Liszt's E flat Pianoforte concerto, and the balance towards classicism was restored by a Haydn Symphony (the first of the Salomon series). Elgar's 'Cockaigne' Overture, and Glinka's seldom-heard overture to 'Russian and Ludmila,' were also included in the programme. On March 15 the season came to a close with the 'Pathetic' Symphony and some other popular orchestral pieces, and the concerts have proved so successful that the committee announce a series of six concerts next season. Mr. Frank Mullings made an emphatic success by his ardent singing of Siegfried's two Forging songs, one of which he had to repeat. The rival concerts begun by Mr. Julian Clifford also came to a conclusion, when, on March 1, he too chose the 'Pathetic,' and gave an excellent performance of it, besides playing the solo part in Saint-Saëns's rather dull fifth Pianoforte concerto. On this occasion Mr. Mannito Klitgaard, a Danish bass, made an excellent impression by his very fine voice and intelligent style. The Rasch Quartet, on February 19, gave their last concert under their present leader, Mr. Johan Rasch, who, for some years one of the leading violinists in the town, has accepted a post in Germany. Goldmark's Pianoforte quintet in B flat (with Mr. Noel Bell as pianist), and Beethoven's last String quartet, the striking work in F (Op. 135), were the principal features of a programme which, like its performance, fully sustained the high reputation of these concerts. On March 8, Mr. Isidor Cohn gave a recital of the pianoforte compositions of that marvellous boy, Erich Korngold. The power shown in the second Sonata is quite uncanny; the picturesqueness of the 'Märchenbilder,' though wonderful in its occasional flashes of vivid expression, is more comprehensible in a boy. Miss Ella Child's Pianoforte recital, on February 26, introduced some unfamiliar things—a group of recent Debussy pieces, Liszt's B minor Sonata, and, most interesting of all, Busoni's clever and effective transcription of Bach's Chaconne, which was very brilliantly played.

BRADFORD.

At the Bradford Subscription Concert on March 7, Brahms's 'German Requiem' was given, with the co-operation of the Hallé Orchestra and the Festival Choral Society, the soloists being Miss Louie Fidler and Mr. Robert Maitland, of whom the latter proved the more suited to his task. Mr. Balling's reading sometimes sacrificed dignity to brilliance, but the choral singing was excellent. The very interesting 'Appalachia' variations of Frederick Delius were also given, and served as a rather belated introduction of that composer to his native town. On the following evening the last of the Permanent Orchestra's concerts took place. Beethoven's great Pianoforte concerto in E flat was included in the programme, but the soloist, Madame Klepper, had hardly enough force and distinction of style for such a work, though she played with delicacy and charm. Mr. Fricker conducted. The Free Chamber Concerts organized by Mr. Midgley have been continued. On February 24 the programme was confined to Beethoven, two of whose Violin sonatas were played, while the song-cycle 'An die ferne Geliebte' was another interesting feature. On March 10 Beethoven's Septet and Schubert's 'Trout' Quintet were greatly enjoyed by the audience.

The choral concerts need no more than the briefest mention: on March 5 the Bradford Old Choral Society, under Mr. E. J. Pickles, gave 'Elijah,' on March 14 the Festival Choral Society, under Sir F. Cowen, gave a concert of unaccompanied choral music, Bach's Motet for a double choir, 'Be not afraid' being the chief item in the programme. The 'German Requiem' was given in All Saints', Bradford, under Mr. Charles Stott, on March 17.

OTHER TOWNS.

At Huddersfield the famous Choral Society, one of the strongest in its material of any in the West Riding, gave Berlioz's 'Faust' on March 7, under Dr. Coward's direction, and with Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Alfred Heather, and Mr. Charles Tree as principals. On February 18 the Glee and Madrigal Society, of which Mr. C. H. Moody is now the conductor, gave one of their typical programmes, including madrigals by Orlando di Lasso and Benet, and part-songs by Elgar and others. The Subscription Concert on March 11 was of more than ordinary interest, the Hallé Orchestra, under Mr. Balling, appearing in a popular programme that included Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony.

At Halifax the beautifully finished singing of the Madrigal Society on March 1, in old madrigals by Morley and Wilbye, and modern part-songs by Bantock and Debussy, was heard to the utmost advantage, and reflected credit on the able training of their conductor, Mr. H. Shepley. On March 6 the Halifax Choral Society, under Mr. Fricker, gave a programme which, in Brahms's 'Triumphlied' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan,' afforded not only some striking contrasts, but a task worthy of this very efficient choir. On March 13 the Halifax Orchestral Society essayed Dvorák's 'New World' Symphony, an exacting task for an amateur body, of which, under Mr. van Dyk's guidance, they acquitted themselves at least creditably. At the Halifax Chamber Concert on March 14 the Rawdon Briggs Quartet gave a fine reading of Beethoven's Quartet in B flat (Op. 130), and, with Mr. Herbert Johnson as pianist, of Dvorák's charming Quintet.

The Hull Harmonic Society, on February 28, gave a performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' under Mr. W. Porter's direction, and though this difficult work severely taxed their resources, achieved a considerable measure of success. The singing of Miss Jennie Taggart and Mr. Alfred Heather deserves special recognition. On March 11 the Hull Vocal Society, under Dr. G. H. Smith, gave 'Elijah,' and on March 14 the Philharmonic Society, of which Mr. J. W. Hudson is conductor, gave a programme of orchestral music, the chief feature of which was Beethoven's seventh Symphony.

The Keighley Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. J. B. Summerscales, gave, on March 5, a concert of popular music, including the first 'Peer Gynt' Suite, and the 'Freischütz' Overture, Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture being included in memory of the late Mr. Frank Davidson, a young musician, some of whose works had been given by the Society. On March 4, the Morley Choral Society departed from their usual routine by giving a very enjoyable orchestral concert, at which Mr. Fricker conducted the 'Unfinished' Symphony, and Mr. L. F. Bundle played the solo part in Schumann's Introduction and Allegro for pianoforte and orchestra. The Ilkley Vocal Society gave, on March 3, a refined and sympathetic performance, under Mr. Akeroyd's direction, of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan.' The Armlay Choral Society, which, under Mr. H. H. Pickard's training, has won for itself more than local fame, gave Handel's 'Samson' with very good effect, on March 11, and justified this revival of a neglected masterpiece. On February 19, the last of the series of chamber concerts instituted by Mr. Hylton Stewart at Scarborough introduced as vocalist Mr. Plunket Greene, who, with the very sympathetic co-operation of Mr. Berkeley Mason, gave a generous selection of songs of all periods. Miss Mabel Moss contributed pianoforte solos. On March 13, Brahms's 'German Requiem' was given at St. Martin's, Scarborough, under Dr. Ely's direction, and with Mr. Hylton Stewart at the organ. The same work was given in Wakefield Cathedral on the same day, Mr. J. N. Hardy, the organist, conducting, and again at Dewsbury Parish Church on March 18, under the direction of the organist, Mr. G. H. Hirst.

Country News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—The forty-sixth concert of the University Choral and Orchestral Society, which took place on February 21, was notable for an excellent performance of Bach's 'Phœbus and Pan,' under the direction of Professor C. Sanford Terry. The solo parts were taken by Miss Dorothy Silk, Mr. H. P. Skalkle, Mr. A. C. Kidd, and Mr. J. B. O'Connor. The choir also gave 'Follow me 'ome,' a ballad for chorus and orchestra, by M. F. Bell, as arranged by Professor Terry, and the following part-songs:— 'Sleeping' and 'In praise of Neptune,' by Edward German, 'Tanzlied,' arranged by Cornelius, and 'Eheu! Fugaces dies,' by Mr. J. S. Cook, a member of the Society. The orchestra also contributed separately.

CUPAR.—The complete cycle of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' was performed with good effect by the Choral Union on February 27, under the direction of Mr. J. M. Cooper. The choral singing was of a high standard, and good work was done by the soloists, Miss Jean Gibson, Mr. John Jamieson, and Mr. Alex. Richard. A small orchestra, assisted at the pianoforte by Mr. D. Coutts, provided accompaniments.

DOVER.—A course of lectures arranged by Mr. H. J. Taylor in connection with the Municipal Institute has just been concluded at Dover. They have been given on alternate Saturdays before large and interested audiences. The first lecture was given by Dr. E. J. Bellerby on 'How to enjoy music.' Two lectures on 'The orchestra' were given by Mr. H. J. Taylor, the first dealing with stringed instruments, the second with wind instruments and percussion. Each instrument was shown and used, upwards of seventy examples being given. The last lecture was by Dr. Charlton Palmer, on 'Musical absurdities in connection with music and musical people.' Dr. Palmer dealt with absurdities in notation, in pianists, in vocalists, in church music, &c. The subject being one full of humour, it was much enjoyed.

DUNDEE.—Elgar's 'Caractacus' was performed for the first time in this city by the Amateur Choral Union on February 19. The soloists were Miss Jenny Taggart, Mr. Maurice D'Oisly, Mr. Herbert Brown, and Mr. Fletcher Perry. The work was enthusiastically received by a large audience. A band of forty-five, under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Cole, ably supplied the exacting orchestral accompaniments. Mr. Charles M. Cowe conducted.

EPFING.—The Epping Choral Society gave their annual concert on February 26 in the Church Room (the Town Hall having unfortunately been burned down). The principal works given were Sir Frederick Bridge's 'A Song of the English' and 'The Cradle of Christ,' and the composer, who received an ovation, kindly conducted. The solos were taken by Miss Katherine Vincent and Mr. Graham Smart, who also contributed songs which were much appreciated. Instrumental solos were given by Mr. Frederick Simmons (who led the orchestra) and by Mr. E. Ralph Franklin, the Society's excellent accompanist. Mr. Henry Riding played the harmonium, and Mr. Donald Penrose conducted the part-songs and Grieg's 'Landerkenning.'

HEANOR (DERBYSHIRE).—A most successful performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was recently given in the Town Hall under the conductorship of Mr. A. H. Bonsor. The artists were Miss Nellie Judson, Miss Irene Buckley, Mr. E. Kemp, and Mr. James Coleman. The choir of 100 voices obtained admirable effect in the dramatic choruses.

HOYLAKES.—The Male-Voice Choir, after a period of inactivity, gave a highly-successful concert in the Town Hall on March 6. Mr. Gershom Stewart, M.P., said the choir was a credit to his constituency, and hoped it would never hibernate again. The artists were Mr. Charles Tree, Misses Ruby Round (violin), Nellie Marshall and C. Campbell. Mr. Charles Hughes (Southport) is the conductor.

GUILDFORD.—A successful performance of Gounod's 'The Redemption' was given on March 13 by the Guildford Choral and Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. Archibald Hollier. The solo parts were taken by Miss Carrie Lanceley, Miss Kate Osborn, Mrs. Cole, Mr. Frank Tebbutt, and Mr. George Baker.

HANLEY.—On March 13, the Glee and Madrigal Society gave as good a performance of 'A tale of Old Japan' as could be desired. The rich, smooth tone of the choir and its characteristically refined style were admirably suited to Coleridge-Taylor's sleek, melodious music. Elgar's 'Britons, alert,' from 'Caractacus,' provided contrasted material, in which the choir were again heard to great advantage. The programme also included orchestral numbers and contributions by the soloists, Miss Doris Carter, Miss Winifred Lewis, Mr. Maurice d'Oisly, and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. John James conducted.

HAYTHE.—The Choral Society gave the third concert of their tenth season on March 12, when 'The Creation' (Haydn) was performed, with the omission of only two recitatives and one duet. Miss Blanche Kemble, Mr. Ernest Turner, and Mr. F. L. Keefe were the solo vocalists. Mr. A. T. Dixon was leader of the band, and Dr. A. T. Froggatt conducted.

KIDDERMINSTER.—Two humorous cantatas—'John Gilpin' and 'The wedding of Shon Maclean'—were the principal items in the programme of a recent concert of the Choral Society, given under the direction of Mr. J. Irving Glover. The choral singers did their work with great spirit, and admirable solo singing was provided by Miss Perceval Allen and Mr. James Coleman.

KIRKCALDY.—An excellent concert was given by the Amateur Orchestral Society on February 26, under the direction of Mr. J. M. Cooper. MacCunn's 'Land of the mountain and the flood,' Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman' Overture, and Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony were in the programme, and solo numbers were provided by Mr. John Jamieson (vocalist) and Mr. James Messeas (violinist).

LEICESTER.—Highly-creditable performances of Coleridge-Taylor's 'A tale of Old Japan' and Sir Hubert Parry's 'The Piper of Hamelin' were given by the Philharmonic Society on March 11, under the direction of Mr. Walter J. Bunney. The choral singing and the work of the soloists, Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Violet Elliott, Mr. Frank Mullings and Mr. Julien Henry, were at a high standard, a fact which made the smallness of the audience all the more regrettable.

LEYEN.—The Amateur Orchestral Society of thirty performers gave a concert on February 28, under Mr. J. M. Cooper's conductorship. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony was the chief number. Solos were given by Mr. Davidson (vocalist) and Mr. Messeas (violinist).

LYNN.—A high standard was attained by the singing of the Musical Society in a performance of 'Elijah' on March 5, under the direction of Mr. W. J. Comley. The choral interpretation was marked by good expression and attractive tone. The solo parts were well taken by Miss Idwen Thomas, Miss Evelyn Pull, Mr. Herbert Thompson, and Mr. Graham Smart. Mr. F. A. Keene was at the organ.

NEWPORT PAGNELL.—The Musical Society gave their annual concert in the new Electric Theatre on Tuesday, February 28. Musical Societies from Fenny Stratford, Olney, and Wolverton contributed members to augment the local forces, and a band and choir of 140 gave a splendid performance of 'The Messiah.' The soloists were Miss Idwen Thomas, Miss Marjorie Lockey, Mr. Herbert Thompson, and Mr. Graham Smart. Mr. C. Kenneth Garratt conducted. A large audience attended.

NEWPORT (SHROPSHIRE).—Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was performed with good effect by the Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. James Smart, on March 11 at the Town Hall. The solo parts were taken by Miss Christine Bywater, Miss Edith Gould, Mr. Jesse Hackett, and Mr. James Coleman.

PORTSMOUTH.—The programme of the Philharmonic Society's concert on March 6 had several points of interest, chief among which was Elgar's 'The Music Makers.' An admirable performance was given, in which the spirit of the words and music was fully reflected. The alto soloist was Miss Phyllis Lett. The choir were also heard separately in Charles Macpherson's 'Adieu, sweet Amaryllis' and in a Bach Motet. Miss Muriel Seymour, a violinist in the orchestra, was the pianoforte soloist in Schumann's Concerto. Mr. Hugh Burry conducted.

ST. HELENS.—Cowen's 'The rose maiden' was performed with admirable effect by the Co-operative Choral Society on March 6, under the direction of Mr. Abram Jones. Both the choral singing and the work of the soloists, Miss Rowena Thomas, Miss B. Myrtle Jones, Mr. Charles Lawrenson, and Mr. Richard Tranter, contributed to the success of the occasion.

SOUTHPORT.—The Southport Choral Society on March 7, at the Cambridge Hall, gave their last concert of the present series, and completed their twenty-fifth season of continued concerts. In Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' the choir displayed excellent tone, and the interpretation was very dignified and impressive. Tone and attack were alike good, and there were many delightful points in phrasing. In Brahms's Rhapsody for contralto solo and male choir Miss Teresa Alfani sang the solo part with great earnestness, and the chorus parts of this work were ably sustained by the Southport Vocal Union. This fine body of male singers also gave effective interpretations of 'Deep Jordan's banks,' by Jenkins, and Coleridge-Taylor's 'The lee shore.' Miss Dorothy Crewe gave thoughtful and artistic pianoforte solos. Mr. J. C. Clarke proved himself once more an able conductor.

SUNBURY-ON-THAMES.—The Choral Society gave an excellent performance at St. Mary's Parish Hall, on March 6, of Farmer's 'Christ and His Soldiers,' the solos being well sung by Mesdames Addington, Metcalfe, and Summers, and Messrs. Bishop, Herridge, and Idle. Mr. F. Broad, organist of St. Mary's Church, conducted.

TAMWORTH.—The Choral Society (established in 1886) performed 'Elijah' on March 5 before a large audience. Choir and orchestra numbered over 120. The soloists were Madame Laura Taylor, Miss Marguerite Sadler, Mr. Ernest Ludlow, and Mr. William Bately. Mr. H. Rose conducted.

TROWBRIDGE.—Dunhill's 'Tubal Cain' and Pattison's 'The Ancient Mariner' were performed recently by the choir of the Congregational Church under the direction of Mr. E. C. Beaven. The principals were Misses Alexander and Hares, Mr. C. Hares, and Mr. F. Hillman.

WATFORD.—At the Public Library on February 19 the orchestras of the School of Music gave an excellent programme under the direction of Mr. Victor Duane. The junior section played two movements from Mozart's Symphony in D major (No. 23), and the senior section gave two movements from the 'Jupiter' Symphony and concerto movements, with Miss Nora M. Godman (violinist) and Mr. Frederick Pratt (pianist) as soloists. Mr. Ernest Hodgins (vocalist), Miss Eileen Duane (violinist), and Mr. Victor Duane (violinist) also performed.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The Festival Choral Society, which has well earned its wide reputation, gave a most creditable performance of Brahms's 'Requiem' at the Agricultural Hall on March 10. The choir's capacity for subdued and dignified expression found a fitting medium in this solemnly magnificent music, and the interpretation, given under Mr. George Halford's direction, was impressive. Appropriate work was done by Miss Alice Hare and Mr. Harry Downing as soloists. The programme of the concert also included Beethoven's fifth Symphony.

Foreign Notes.

ANGERS.

A two-act opera, 'Le Retour,' composed to his own libretto by Max d'Ollone, was produced at the Grand Theatre on February 13.

AUGSBURG.

At the last concert of the Oratorienverein an interesting symphonic-poem, 'Brand' (based on Ibsen's drama), by Karl Pottgiesser, was produced under the composer's direction.

BARMEN.

Under the conductorship of Herr Heger, Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was recently given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre.

BAYONNE.

Massenet's opera 'Thérèse' was lately played for the first time at the Opéra with great success.

BERLIN.

The Singakademie (conductor, Professor Georg Schumann) has given an interesting concert devoted to modern choral works. The programme included Bruckner's 150th Psalm, 'Hymnus an Amor' by Ernst Eduard Taubert, Hugo Kaun's 126th Psalm, the sixth chapter of 'The vision of St. John' by Walter Braunsfels, and Richard Strauss's 'Wanderers Stürmied' for six-part chorus.—Two new choral works by Siegmund von Hausegger, 'Die Weihe der Nacht' and 'Sonnenaufgang,' were produced under the direction of Professor Siegfried Ochs at the third concert of the Philharmonischer Chor.—An interesting Brahms programme was submitted by the Brahmsverein. Under the direction of Herr Fritz Rückward fine performances were given of the motet 'Warum ist das Licht gegeben dem Mühseligen' for four- and six-part chorus a cappella (Op. 74), and the 'Fest und Gedenksprüche' for eight-part chorus (Op. 109). 'The Neuen Liebeslieder Walzer' for solo voices, chorus, and pianoforte duet were also included in the programme.—Hans Fitzner's overture 'Das Christelflein,' a Prelude and Fugue for orchestra by Ernst von Reznicek, 'Die Insel der Kirke' (the second of the 'Vier Episoden aus Odysseus Fahrten') by Ernst Boehe, the Prelude to the third Act of Max Schillings's opera 'Der Pfeifertag,' and Spohr's Concerto for string quartet and orchestra figured in the programme of the sixth Symphony Concert of the Königliche Kapelle (conductor, Dr. Richard Strauss).—At his last pianoforte recital Herr Karl Friedberg produced a new 'Sonata eroica' by Waldemar von Baussem.—The Brussels and Fitzner Quartets gave a concert devoted to Octets, the programme including beautiful examples by Johan Svendsen (Op. 3) and Mendelssohn.—The Pfannschmidt'scher Chor sang Mendelssohn's 'Loreley' Finale, Georg Schumann's 'Sehnsucht,' and a new choral work, 'Die deutsche Tanne,' by Friedrich E. Koch.—Mlle. Nathalie Aktzéry gave three recitals consisting of Russian songs from the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries. The programmes included works by Schilin, Dietz, Koslowsky, Kaschin, Bonlachoff, Wielhorsky, Glinka, Dargomysky, Rubinstein, Moussorgsky, Borodin, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Arensky, Davidoff, Cui, Balakireff, Glazounoff, Liapounoff, Tscherepennin, Glière, Gnjeßin, Stravinsky, Rachmaninoff, Wassilenko, and Sacknoifzsky.—The Königliches Akademisches Institut für Kirchengesang gave a concert devoted to compositions by Orlando di Lasso. The programme contained some of this master's finest works, such as a three-part 'Adoramus Te, Christe' and the two six-part motets, 'Timor et tremor' and 'Confitebor Tibi, Domine.'—Lortzing's opera, 'Der Waffenschmied,' was recently revived at the Deutsches Opernhaus.—Under the direction of Professor Arthur Nikisch, Josef Holbrooke's tone-poem 'Queen Mab' was performed at the ninth Philharmonic Concert for the first time in Berlin. Although the critics differ in their appreciation of the work, they nearly all admit the composer's remarkable command of the orchestra. The programme also included Strauss's 'Ein Heldenleben.'—A new Symphonic Rhapsody by Walter Lampe was played for the first time at the fifth Hausegger Konzert.—A Symphony in F minor (No. 3), by Max von Oberleitner, Debussy's choral work 'La Demoiselle élue,' new songs with orchestra by Weingartner, and 'A Pagan Poem' by Ch. M. Loeffler, formed the programme of the third of the Moderne Symphonie-Konzerte (conductor, Herr Iwann Fröbe).—Bruckner's eighth Symphony was played at a concert conducted by Herr Werner Wolff.—At Sam Franko's last concert of old orchestral music Handel's 'Concerto Grosso' in G minor, a Symphony in D major by Stamitz, several airs-de-ballet by Grétry, and Philipp Emanuel Bach's Pianoforte concerto in D minor were heard. Max Reger's Violin sonata in F sharp minor, Op. 84, was played by Madame Elly Ney van Hoogstraten and Herr Willi van Hoogstraten.—A new Pianoforte concerto by Serge von Bortkiewicz was recently produced by Herr Emeric von Stefanian.—Under the direction of Herr Leo Blech, Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was given for the first time at the Royal Opera. It was admirably performed, and made a success.—An interesting programme, including Rudolf Siegel's 'Apostaten Marsch,' 'Requiem' for tenor solo, male choir and orchestra by Conrad Ansong, an early composition by Richard Strauss, 'Der Brautanzug,' and Liszt's Trauerode 'Die Toten,' was submitted by the Charlottenburger Lehrergesangsverein.—Cherubini's 'Anakreon' Overture and Berlioz's dramatic symphony 'Romeo and Juliet' were played under the direction of Dr. Richard Strauss at the seventh Symphony concert of the Königliche-Kapelle.

BONN.

Under the auspices of the Society Beethovenhaus the eleventh chamber-music Festival will take place during the days of April 27—May 1. The programme will contain among other works Beethoven's String quartets, Op. 18, No. 4, and Op. 130, the Serenade for flute, violin, and viola, Op. 25, Brahms's Sextet for strings, Op. 18, and the Pianoforte quintet in F minor; also the String quartet in E flat, Op. 109, and the Pianoforte quartet in D minor, Op. 117, by Reger. One evening will be largely occupied by instrumental compositions by Bach, including the Concerto for two pianofortes and string orchestra in C major. On the same occasion Vivaldi's Concerto for three violins and a set of old madrigals will be heard. The Festival will terminate with performances of Mozart's Clarinet quintet and Schumann's Pianoforte quintet. Among the artists engaged are the Rosé Quartet, the Klingler Quartet, the Bohemian Quartet, and Messrs. Eugen D'Albert and Max Reger.

BREMEN.

The programme of the sixth Philharmonic Concert (conductor, Professor Wendel) included Ernst Boehe's 'Tragic Overture.'—At the seventh concert, Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style,' and Brahms's second Pianoforte concerto in B flat (soloist, Madame Elly Ney van Hoogstraten) were played.

BRESLAU.

Brahms's cantata 'Rinaldo' was performed by the Waltzdsche Gesangverein. —The Lehrergesangverein gave Beyle's 'Vereinsamt' (text by Nietzsche) and Hegar's 'Heldenzeit.'—Verdi's four 'pezzi sacri' figured in the programme of the Singakademie (conductor, Professor Dohrn).—At the Symphony Concerts the outstanding features have been performances of Liszt's 'Dante' Symphony, the fifth Symphony in B flat major by Bruckner, Weingartner's new 'Lustige' Overture, and Max Reger's 'Romantische Suite.'

BRUNSWICK.

Oscar von Chelius's opera 'Die vernarrte Prinzessin' was recently given for the first time at the Court Theatre.

BRUSSELS.

Symphonic pieces from Massenet's 'Erynnies' and Jan Blockx's 'Triptyque symphonique' ('Jour des Morts,' 'Noël,' et 'Pâques') were heard at the third Conservatoire concert. On February 22 a new opera, 'Kaatje,' composed by Victor Buffin to the libretto of Henri Cain (an adaptation of a play by Paul Spaak), was produced under the direction of M. Otto Lohse with success at the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie.

BUDA-PESTH.

Among the most interesting works heard lately at the Philharmonic Concerts have been Mahler's 'Das Lied von der Erde,' a 'Suite-symphonique' by Nikolaus Radnai, Massenet's Overture to 'Phédre,' Saint-Saëns's third Symphony in C minor (with organ and pianoforte), and Debussy's Rhapsody with clarinet obligato. —On the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of Professor Jenő Hubay's artistic activity a musical Festival devoted to his compositions took place lately. The chief feature of this was a performance of the opera 'Der Geigenmacher von Cremona.' His well-known pupils, Madame Stefi Geyer and Messrs. Franz von Vecsey and Joseph Szigeti, played the four Violin concertos. The King-Emperor conferred the high title of Königlich-ungarischer Hofrath on the artist, who was the recipient of honours from all sections of the public.

CASSEL.

Mahler's fifth Symphony and Max Reger's 'Romantische' Suite were played at a Symphony Concert of the Königliche Kapelle (conductor, Herr Franz Beier).—At a concert of the Meininger Hofkapelle (conductor, Dr. Max Reger) Reger's 'Concerto in the olden style' was introduced.

CHEMNITZ.

Franz Mayerhoff's second Symphony in C minor was lately produced under the composer's direction. On the same occasion a Scherzo for orchestra, Op. 7, and a 'Rhapsodie sur des Thèmes de l'Oukraine,' by Erwin Lendvai, were played for the first time.

COBLENZ.

Under the direction of Professor Willem Kes the 'Schauspiel' Overture, by Korngold, was performed for the first time.

COLOGNE.

Otto Neitzel's opera 'Barbarina' was given for the first time at the Municipal Opera House on February 9. The work, which is in three Acts with an epilogue, was cordially received. Later, Hans Pfitzner's opera 'Der arme Heinrich' was introduced under the direction of Herr Gustav Brecher, and proved a great success.—Enrico Bossi's 'Der Blinde' for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra, and his Organ concerto in A minor (most excellently played by the composer) and a 'Venizianische Suite' by Franca di Venezia, figured in the programme of the seventh Gürzenichkonzert (conductor, Herr Fritz Steinbach). On the same occasion Sgambati's interesting Pianoforte concerto was performed with Signor de Solis as soloist.

CREFELD.

Under the direction of Professor Müller-Reuter the 'Passions-Oratorium' by Felix Woysch was lately performed by the Singverein. The work made a favourable impression.

DARMSTADT.

A Serenade for string orchestra, by Johann Cleuver, was introduced at a Symphony Concert of the Court Orchestra.—Max Reger's choral work 'Die Nonnen' was performed for the first time at a concert of the Musikverein.—Four beautiful songs, 'Unser Herz ist unruhig,' 'Tag und Nacht,' 'Der kurze Frühling,' and 'Immer wenn der Märzwind weht,' for female choir a cappella, by Arnold Mendelssohn, were produced at a concert of the Wagnerverein.

DESSAU.

Ernst von Dohnányi's String quartet in D flat and a Pianoforte trio in B major by Franz Mikorey were played at the third Chamber-music Concert.

DONAUESCHINGEN.

An unpublished Symphony of Haydn that has until recently been in the ducal private library was produced under the direction of Herr Burkard.

DORTMUND.

Handel's 'Acis and Galatea' and Bach's 'Phœbus and Pan' were performed at a concert of the Musikverein (conductor, Professor Janssen).

DRESDEN.

Tchaikovsky's rarely-heard Sextet for strings, 'Souvenir de Florence' (Op. 70), was performed at a concert of the Tonkünstlerverein.—Bruckner's ninth Symphony was played by the Königliche Kapelle.

DÜSSELDORF.

Under the direction of Professor Karl Panzner, Paul Ertel's symphonic-poem 'Hero and Leander' was played at the sixth Symphony Concert.—Berlioz's Te Deum for three choirs, orchestra, organ, and tenor solo, was given for the first time at the sixth Musikvereins-concert (conductor, Professor Panzner).—Offenbach's 'Die schöne Helena' was revived at the Municipal Theatre.

ELBERFELD.

Siegfried Wagner's opera, 'Der Bärenhäuter,' was recently given for the first time (with the composer as conductor) at the Municipal Theatre, and was well received.—Henry Février's opera, 'Monna Vanna' (after Maeterlinck's drama), was given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre. The work was very well received.

FRANKFURT.

Richard Strauss's 'Ariadne auf Naxos' was given for the first time at the Opera House without conspicuous success. A better fate met the revival of Debussy's 'Pelleas and Melisande.'

GENEVA.

Among the most interesting recent features at the Symphony Concerts have been performances of Mahler's ninth Symphony, Richard Strauss's tone-poem 'Don Quixote,' and 'Deux préludes de Saint-Sébastien,' by Debussy, all of which were excellently played under the direction of Herr Bernhard Stavenhagen.—Gabriel Dupont's opera 'La Glu' was lately introduced at the Municipal Theatre.

GIESSEN.

At the last two concerts of the Konzertverein, Reger's choral work, 'Die Nonnen,' and 'Romantische Suite,' Bruckner's third Symphony, and Beethoven's 'Missa Solennis' were performed.

GRAZ.

Richard Strauss's 'Der Rosenkavalier' was recently given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre with great success.

HALLE.

Sibelius's 'König Christian' Suite was played at the fourth Symphony Concert in the Municipal Theatre.

HAMBURG.

The Singakademie (conductor, Professor Barth) gave a concert performance of Cornelius's 'Der Barbier von Bagdad' (in the edition of Felix Mottl).—The programme of the last Philharmonic Concert, given under the direction of Herr von Hausegger, contained Max Schillings's Violin concerto and three Böcklin-Phantasies for orchestra by Felix Woysrch.

HEIDELBERG.

The seventh concert of the Bachverein was devoted to old instrumental music, the programme including works by Jacob Peri, Fr. Cavalli, M. A. Cesti, S. Rosa, G. Sarti, Paësiello, Gluck, Piccini, Ditters von Dittersdorf, Rameau, and Mozart.—Handel's 'Concerto grosso' in B minor, a rarely-heard Symphony for strings with two oboes and two horns by Haydn, and Chabrier's Rhapsody 'España' were performed at the eighth concert.

KARLSRUHE.

Two new operas, 'Zuleima,' by the eighteen-year-old composer, Heinrich Bienstock (libretto by Ferdinand Lion), and 'Der fahrende Schüler im Paradies' (an adaptation of Hans Sachs's carnival-play by Fritz Koennecke), were recently produced at the Court Theatre. Both composers show much talent, though that of Koennecke is more mature.

LEIPZIG.

Under the direction of Herr Otto Lohse, Franz Schreker's very interesting opera 'Der ferne Klang' was given for the first time at the Municipal Theatre with great success. The work is undoubtedly one of the most remarkable products of recent years.—Bruckner's Symphony in A major was given for the first time at a Gewandhaus concert (conductor, Professor Arthur Nikisch).—Volkmann's Overture to 'Richard III.' was played at a Philharmonic Concert under the direction of Professor Hans Winderstein.—The Riedel-Verein (conductor, Dr. Georg Göhler) gave fine performances of Bossi's 'Canticum Canticorum' and Verdi's 'Te Deum' and 'Stabat Mater.'—At the last concert of the Bachverein, Professor Straube secured excellent performances of five of Bach's most beautiful cantatas.—At the concert of the Pauliner Gesangverein, Kurt Stiegler's choral work, 'Elfenlied,' and Karl Bleyer's 'Sieges-Ouverture zur Jahrhundertfeier der Schlacht bei Leipzig' were produced.—Georg Schumann's oratorio, 'Ruth,' was sung for the first time by the Philharmonischer Chor (conductor, Herr Richard Hagel).—Under the conductorship of Dr. Georg Göhler, Mahler's 'Lied von der Erde' was performed for the first time in Leipzig.—A performance of Max Bruch's 'Lied von der Glocke' was given by the Singakademie (conductor, Herr Gustav Wohlgenuth).—The Rebner Quartet, from Frankfurt, played an interesting MS. Quartet (Op. 31) by Cyril Scott.

MANNHEIM.

One of the most notable of recent events has been a performance of Arnold Schönberg's tone-poem 'Pelleas und Melisande.' The work, excellently played under the baton of Herr Bodanzky, achieved a considerable success.

MOSCOW.

Brahms's 'Schicksalslied' and Hugo Wolf's 'Feuerreiter' were given for the first time in Moscow under the direction of M. Serge Kusnezitsky.—At another of Kusnezitsky's concerts, works by Fanelli, Debussy, and Ravel were heard with great interest.—The name of Scriabine has been much in evidence. M. Kusnezitsky has performed the 'Poème de l'Extase,' all the Symphonies have been played recently, and at the sixth Philharmonic Concert M. Leonid Kreutzer conducted the 'Poème divin'; M. Siloti included the second Symphony and the extraordinary 'Prometheus' (with the composer at the piano) in one of his programmes.—Melartin's third Symphony was played under the composer's direction at the fifth concert of the Imperial Russian Music Society.

MÜNCHEN-GLADBACH.

Richard Strauss's Symphonic-fantasy 'Aus Italien,' and Max Schillings's 'Hexenlied,' were played at the fourth Symphony Concert under the conductorship of Herr Gelbke.

NANCY.

Massenet's last opera 'Roma' has been given for the first time, with success.

NEW YORK.

The ensemble of the Chicago Opera (manager, Mr. Dippel) introduced Kienzl's opera 'Der Kuhreigen' and Zandonai's 'Conchita'—Wolf-Ferrari's 'Le Donne curiose' was given with great success under Signor Toscanini's direction.—The policy of producing operas by native composers, inaugurated by the Metropolitan Opera Company last year with the production of Dr. Parker's 'Mona,' was recently followed up. The work chosen this time was Dr. Walter Damrosch's opera 'Cyrano de Bergerac' (the libretto being an adaptation of Rostand's drama). The work, excellently presented under the direction of Herr Alfred Hertz, was well received by the public; but the general opinion is that, although fluent and effective, the music lacks originality.

NICE.

A new opera, 'Myriane,' composed by Charles Silver to the libretto of Messrs. P. Ferrier and P. de Choudens, was recently produced at the Opéra.

PARIS.

Schumann's 'Faust' scenes were performed at the Conservatoire Concert on February 23.—At the Colonne Concert given on the same day, Fanelli's interesting 'Fête dans le Palais de Pharaon' was played with success, which, however, did not reach the delirious dimensions of last year, when the composer sprang into fame from utter obscurity.—Bourgault Ducoudray's 'Rhapsodie cambodgienne' was included in the programme of the Lamoureux Concert.—A new opera, 'Carmosine,' by Henry Février (libretto by Messrs. Henri Cain and Louis Payen), was successfully produced on February 24.—On March 2 Théodore Dubois's 'Symphonie Française,' was played at the Conservatoire Concert.—A fine performance of César Franck's 'Les Béatitudes' was given under the direction of M. Gabriel Pierné at the Colonne Concert on March 7.—On the same day Mahler's 'Kindertotenlieder' were sung at the Lamoureux Concert.—A most interesting 'Scherzo fantastique' by Igor Stravinsky was played at the Sechiarì Concert.—Glück's 'Armide' has been revived at the Grand Opéra.

PRAGUE.

At the last concert of the Kammermusikverein Arnold Schönberg's 'Pierrot Lunaire' Lieder were performed, and were most emphatically hissed by a large section of the public.

ROME.

Vincenzo Tommasini's comic opera, 'Egual fortuna,' was recently produced at the Costanzi Theatre. The composer (who is his own librettist) shows much talent, and his work was well received.

ROUEN.

A new opera, 'Graziella,' composed by Jules Mazellier to the text by Messrs. Henri Cain and Gastambide, was lately produced at the Opéra.

ST. PETERSBURG.

Dr. Richard Strauss recently conducted two concerts on his own compositions, and won a great personal success. The majority of the critics, however, failed to appreciate 'Ein Heldenleben.' His 'Elektra' will by now have been performed at the Imperial Opera, where it has for a long time been in preparation.—Mahler's seventh Symphony was played for the first time at the sixth Kuszewitzky Concert.—At the seventh concert the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, 'Chovantschina,' Liadoff's 'Baba Jaga,' and fragments from Igor Stravinsky's Ballet 'Petruschka' were heard with great interest.—The seventh Siloti Concert was occupied largely by works of Bach (all given for the first time in St. Petersburg), the programme including the Magnificat, Prelude to the 140th Cantata, and the sixth 'Brandenburg' Concerto. The concert terminated with a fine performance of Rachmaninoff's cantata, 'The Spring.'—The famous pianist, M. Joseph Hoffmann, has created a sensation this season. He has so far given fourteen pianoforte recitals in the biggest hall here, and has continually played to crowded houses.

VIENNA.

A Kammermusiksymphonie for string quartet, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, and harp, by Richard Stöhr, was produced at a concert of the Tonkünstlerverein.—The Philharmonic Choir (conductor, Herr Franz Schreker) produced Arnold Schönberg's new choral work, 'Gurre Lieder.' A kind of secular oratorio, it is designed for solo voices, male choir, mixed choir, and a very large orchestra, containing a number of divided string groups, twenty-five wood-wind and twenty-five brass, besides a small arsenal of percussion, instruments. There are unmistakable beauties of tone-effects and atmosphere, and passages which to the uninitiated appear hideous or ridiculous. The weakness of the work is its extreme length and too great preponderance of the Adagio movement. The music is said, however, to be often on an intellectual level with the intensely-poetic text of the Danish writer J. P. Jacobsen.—At the Volksoper, Mascagni's opera 'Isabeau' was given for the first time in any German-speaking country. The work was not a great success.—A sensation recently occurred at the Imperial Court Opera. Public dissatisfaction with Herr Gregor's management came to a head at a performance of Meyerbeer's 'Huguenots,' and it vented itself upon an unfortunate understudy for the part of Valenine. The uproar was so violent that the police were summoned to restore order. Herr Gregor has offered to resign.

Miscellaneous.

His Majesty The King has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of Mr. Francesco Berger's volume of 'Reminiscences,' lately published by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co., and dedicated, by special permission, to Queen Alexandra.

Mr. Tobias Matthay gave a lecture on 'The fundamentals of teaching touch or technique' to the London section of the Music Teachers' Association at Morley Hall on February 26.

An extremely interesting lecture on the Viol da Gamba and other old instruments was given by Mr. E. Van der Straeten before the L.C.C. Hackney Institute Musical Society on March 15. The lecturer, who is an indefatigable explorer in the realm of old music, drew up a unique programme of music, largely for gambas, bass-voles, and viole d'amour, to illustrate his remarks. The composers represented were John Jenkins, Simon Ives, Lawes, Corkine, Christopher Simpson, August Kühnel, J. J. Fux, Schenck, Bach, Ariosti, Pietro Torri, Marais, Laborde, d'Hervelois and Philip Rameau. In five cases there were 'novellets.' These were a Bach Aria with obbligato for two gambas; Fancy by Simpson; a Sonata by Kühnel for two gambas with harpsichord; an anonymous vocal duet with accompaniment for three violas; and a song by Laborde.

The Journal of the Welsh Folk Society (vol. i., Part 4), bears witness to the zeal and ability of the promoters of this excellent organization. The section (Part 4) just published is a substantial booklet of sixty pages, and it contains much material of great interest to all interested in folk-song. When the Society was started the members were told that there were no tunes to be collected. Two years ago the Society had collected five hundred, and now—says the editor of the Journal—they have lost count. The preface by the editor reviews the work of the Society up to 1912, and is a very interesting survey. We hope to give consideration to the contents of the volume later on. The secretaries are Mrs. Mary Davies, 12A, Eton Road, Hampstead, London, and Miss Amy Preece, Penrth, Carnarvon.

The name of Mr. Percy A. Scholes (Extension lecturer of Oxford University and of Manchester University) has been added to the supplementary list of Extension lecturers of the University of London.

Mr. Cecil Sharp's second lecture under the auspices of the Folk-Dance Society took place at Queen's (small) Hall on February 20. The subject was 'Morris Dances.'

Mr. Paul Rochard has been appointed conductor of the Nuneaton Choral Society.

Answers to Correspondents.

PROFESSOR G.—(1) The greater number of the issues of the Musical Times for the last six years can be supplied at the original price or a little more. Some, however, are scarce, and are therefore expensive. (2) The usual professional discount is allowed. (3) We will communicate with you on receiving your name and address.

ELSIE COX.—♩ = 69 seems much too fast for the opening. We suggest ♩ = 46, which would leave time for the later elaborations. The ♩ = 96 would then be 'Poco più mosso.'

C. A. F.—Authorities differ as to the time-position of the turn. In the present case we think that the turn should be considered as part of the preceding bar.

Eminent Musicians

TESTIFY TO THE WORTHINESS OF

RUSHWORTH

LIVERPOOL BUILT

Church Organs

C. W. PERKINS, Esq., Organist of the Town Hall and University, BIRMINGHAM, writes:—

“I should like to express my entire satisfaction with your work. . . . Not only is the voicing of individual stops very excellent, but the blending of them seemed to me worthy of the highest praise. The chief characteristics of your later organs are the pure tone of the Diapason work, the liquid and yet full tone of the Flutes and the smoothness of the Reeds, the Swell Oboe being particularly noticeable in this respect. . . . In the Pedal department you have been singularly successful in imparting fulness and regularity to the Open Diapason. . . . Your action is ‘clean,’ and prompt to a remarkable degree, and perfectly noiseless.”

G. R. SINCLAIR, Esq., Mus. Doc., F.R.C.O., Hon. R.A.M., Organist of HEREFORD Cathedral, writes:—

“I can speak very highly of Messrs. Rushworth and Dreaper of Liverpool as Organ Builders, having played on several of their Organs and also carefully examined the work in their Factory. . . . The quality of the Tone which they produce is excellent. . . . Their Solo Stops are voiced artistically, and the Diapason tone is rich and full. . . . Their workmanship is excellent. . . .”

J. I. WEDGWOOD, Esq., an eminent authority and writer on the Church Organ, writes:—

“I have examined very carefully the Organ Works and some recent Organs of Messrs. Rushworth and Dreaper of Liverpool and am fully persuaded that they are worthy to be entrusted with first-class work of any description or magnitude. The Reed work and Diapason Tone seemed to me especially fine and in keeping with the best modern work. . . . The Diapason tone is dignified and ecclesiastical. . . . The Action work was satisfactory in every respect, and markedly so in the case of two large Divided Organs which I examined. . . .”

ALFRED HOLLINS, Esq., the Distinguished Composer and Organist of EDINBURGH, writes:—

“I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the thoroughly good and honest work of Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper, Liverpool. . . . Within the past year I have opened three Rushworth Organs, one being an entire re-build, and all show that the greatest care has been bestowed on every detail. . . . The voicing is done on modern and artistic lines and the instruments are remarkably successful.”

C. H. MOODY, Esq., Organist of RYON Cathedral, writes:—

“I must send a word of congratulation on your beautiful Organ at St. Thomas Church, Wigan. . . . The Diapasons are excellent, and the softer Reeds struck me as being particularly soft and orchestral. The Action leaves nothing to be desired. . . .”

Unabridged copies of the above Appreciations with Illustrations and particulars of RUSHWORTH Organs sent free on request. . . .

REMARKABLE WORK ON MUSIC EDUCATION.

WRITTEN BY FAMOUS EXPERTS.

THAT Wonderful Book, the MUSICAL EDUCATOR, seems this season to be entering upon a new lease of life. As our readers know, its aim is to supply in interesting form a complete and systematic musical education.

We would especially draw attention to the following names of Leaders in the Musical World, and of the subjects for which they are responsible. The practical value of these sections will be apparent to all students and professors of music and singing.

PADEREWSKI,

"On the best way to study the Piano."

MARK HAMBOURG,

"The Piano and how to play it."

CARUSO,

"On the cultivation of the voice."

CLARA BUTT,

"On how to sing a song."

EDWIN H. LEMARE,

"The Art of Organ Playing."

MADAME MARCHESI,

"The Teaching of Singing."

JOHN DUNN,

"On Playing the Violin."

SIR F. H. COWEN,

"The Art of Conducting."

Course of Voice Training, Singing, and Solfeggio. Course on the Pianoforte. Course on the Violin. Positions illustrated by Diagrams and Photographs. Course on Harmonium, American Organ, and on the Organ. Lessons on Scientific Basis of Music. Lessons on Rudiments of Music. Course on Harmony and Counterpoint. Lessons in Canon and Fugue. Lessons in Musical Forms, Musical Analysis and Composition. Dictionary of Musical Terms. Articles on the Instruments used in the Orchestras and in Military Bands. History of Music. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians. Articles on Children's Music and Musical Drill. Articles on Choir Training and Conducting. Article on Congregational Music. Article on Musical Degrees and Education. Article on Nationality in Music.

ITS VALUE TO THE TEACHER.

In "The Musical Educator" every section is dealt with by an expert. Its value to the teacher of music is obvious, because it shows the way—at once simple and lucid—in which some of the greatest of musical professors would set about the instruction of a pupil anxious to perfect himself in his particular department, whether it be that of the piano, the violin, the harp, or any other instrument, or of any department of singing.

Add to this its all-round value as a standard work of reference on every point concerning the wide domain of music and musicians, and it will be granted that "The Musical Educator" is unique as well as complete.

Sir J. FREDERICK BRIDGE writes:

"'The Musical Educator' is full of useful information plainly set forth. The musical illustrations are excellent." Dr. CRÉSER, Mus.D. Oxon., F.R.C.O., F.T.C.L.

(Examiner in Music at Trinity College), writes:—

"We have here an illuminative work of great value, not only to the student, but also to the general reader. . . . It contains excellent instructions."

FAMOUS COMPOSERS AND STUDIES IN MUSICAL HISTORY.

First Payment 2s. 6d. only.

"FAMOUS Composers" is the first work to provide in a satisfactory form a presentment of the lives of all the great composers who have enriched the world with their gifts. The sublime compositions of the great musicians can never be fully appreciated or understood without a sympathetic knowledge of their lives, their times, and their temperaments. For that reason alone this work is indispensable to all real lovers of music, for in the pages of "Famous Composers" will be found biographies of all the great Immortals written by authorities possessing not only the literary skill, but also that spark of genius that lifts the work above the ordinary plane of critical analysis.

The Original Scores Reproduced.

Moreover the work is greatly enriched by the inclusion of examples of facsimile manuscripts of these great composers and their immortal works. Here will be found examples of the original score of Handel's "Messiah," Bach's Prelude to one of his massive Chorals, of Beethoven's tender Sonatas, Chopin's Prelude in D, the weird melodies of Dvorák, Haydn's original manuscript for the Austrian Hymn, Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," Mendelssohn's Melodies as they left the hand of the great composer, and a host of others; in short, never before has such a mass of rare and hitherto unpublished manuscripts been brought together within the compass of a single work. Among them are included facsimiles of music by Auber, Bach, Balfe, Beethoven, Bellini, Bizet, Boieldieu, Brahms, Bruch, Cherubini, Donizetti, Dvorák, Franz, Gade, Gluck, Gounod, Grétry, Grieg, Halévy, Handel, Haydn, Hérold, Liszt, Marschner, Massenet, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Mozart, Pergolesi, Purcell, Raff, Rameau, Rheinberger, Rossini, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Scarlatti, Schubert, Schumann, Sgambati, Spohr, Spontini, Strauss, Sullivan, Thomas, Tchaikowsky, Verdi, Wagner, Weber, &c.

CRITICISM.

In addition to the biographies, the work includes a scholarly criticism of the works of the great composers, its influence and bearing on the development of the particular school represented, and an analytical summary of the great works which have made their names famous. An immense amount of study and research among private papers and documents, original scores, letters and portraits, has shed new lights on their lives, and much that is interesting regarding their illustrious contemporaries.

EXTRACT FROM INTRODUCTION.

The forms of the tones used at Salisbury have been adopted in this revision of the Psalter, and the pointing is based on the principles followed in the palmy days of Plainsong, and preserved in the early manuscripts. The rationale of this system is explained in the recent works of the Benedictines of Solesmes.

PREFACE.

The first edition of The Psalter Noted was published in 1849 under the supervision of the late Rev. Thomas Helmore, and secured for the Gregorian Tones a general recognition of their appropriateness for Divine worship. Subsequently Mr. Helmore's scheme was enlarged by the issue of The Canticles Noted, of A Brief Directory, and of three Appendixes to the Psalter; and the whole collection was issued in one volume under the title of A Manual of Plainsong. The Manual had also two companion books, one of Words only, containing The Canticles and Psalter Accented, the other a collection of Accompanying Harmonies. Thus complete provision was made for the musical performance of the regular services of the Prayer Book. Practical objections, however, to the monotony of the recitation of several Psalms to one Tone without the relief of Antiphons, added to certain difficulties in the pointing, led to the issue of other Psalters which have competed with The Psalter Noted, but without obtaining, any of them, a marked supremacy; and nothing has been issued which covers the whole field so completely as Mr. Helmore's Manual.

Study of the art of Plainsong during the last half century has, however, undergone something like a revolution; on every branch of the question new light has been thrown, and not least upon the principles of pointing. In consequence of repeated demands for a new edition of the Manual, the work of revision was entrusted to the late Sir John Stainer. He readily undertook the task, and called into collaboration Mr. H. B. Briggs and the Rev. W. H. Frere, with the result that before his death he had passed for the press the greater part of the revised proofs prepared by them for the new edition. He had also devoted much time to the consideration, with Mr. Shebbeare, of the Organ Accompaniments, so that the complete work may be considered as his last contribution to the music of the English Church.

The Manual thus appears in a New Edition, revised in accordance with modern standards of taste and science; it does not cover quite so large a field as formerly, for it contains no music for the Holy Communion; but it has the same counterparts as before in the shape of The Canticles and Psalter Accented, and The Accompanying Harmonies: prepared by Mr. Shebbeare, which include accompaniments for the Responses, Te Deum and Litany, as well as for the Tones.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE ORGAN

BY
JOHN STAINER.

EDITED BY JOHN E. WEST.

An important feature of the present Edition of this invaluable and popular Organ Primer is the adoption of the now universally recognized system of fingering—1.2.3.4.5., which is here substituted for the older system—X.1.2.3.4.—in all cases where fingering is marked.

In the explanatory portion of the book, opportunity has been taken of briefly mentioning one or two of the principal additions and improvements to the instrument which have been made since the book was first issued.

Bearing in mind that the Author's aim was to assist, in as concise a manner as possible, the early steps of an organ student, the Editor has refrained from adding any further exercises or pieces to those which were already given. But the addition of a few extra fingering and phrasing marks seemed necessary here and there, and, in the five concluding pieces, the laying-out of one or two of the manual passages has been rendered clearer to the player's eye by means of a slight re-staving.

The admirable explanations and diagrams of the Tubular-Pneumatic and Electric actions have been supplied by Mr. L. Simon, of Messrs. Norman & Beard, Ltd.

TECHNIQUE

AND

EXPRESSION

IN

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety, and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

A

HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS

IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, Durham, and Edinburgh; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, The Royal College of Organists, and The College of Preceptors. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

PREFACE TO THE NINTH EDITION.

The author desires to acknowledge his great indebtedness to the authorities of the London University; the Royal Academy of Music; the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music; The Royal College of Organists; Trinity College of Music, London; and the Incorporated Society of Musicians, for their kindness in allowing him to incorporate copies of their latest Examination Papers in Parts II. and III. of his Handbook, in order that he might present their latest examination requirements.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

THE MILITARY BAND

BY

GEORGE MILLER,

M.V.O., Mus. Bac. Cantab., &c.

Price Two Shillings.

In Paper Boards, Two Shillings and Sixpence.

It is a valuable sketch of a highly specialised subject, and none the less practical because seasoned with humour. The various instruments and their idiosyncrasies are tersely described, and their collective use is admirably illustrated.—Yorkshire Post.

No one is more worthy to speak on such a subject than Lieut. George Miller, and the book is one of great value.—Cheltenham Looker-On.

From this book it is possible to learn the compass and capabilities of each instrument. The explanations are admirably lucid and suggestive; and the final chapters, showing how a work composed originally for the concert-orchestra—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—can effectively be arranged for the military band, teaches more than all the text-books. We heartily commend this most excellent book.—Saturday Review.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

1A. TECHNICAL PRACTICE (1st Position)	2s. 6d.	1B. STUDIES (1st Position)	2s. 6d.
2A. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.	2B. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.

CLARA SCHUMANN:

AN ARTIST'S LIFE. Based on Material found in Diaries and Letters. By BERTHOLD LITZMANN. Translated and Abridged from the 4th Edition by GRACE E. HADOW. With a Preface by DR. W. H. HADOW. Illustrated. In 2 vols. 8vo. 24s. net.

THE TIMES.—"In Dr. Hadow's preface they will find twenty-one pages of illuminating criticism, which give an excellent epitome of the whole work. But this preface does not exhaust the interest or value of the book, even to those who are familiar with German; for the translation has been made with great skill, and conveys the nicest shades of meaning. . . . Too much praise can be given to the way in which the process of abridgment has been carried out."

The

Competition Festival Record

No. 57.

In the March number of the Choir a writer states that 'it is a fact some choirmasters and soloists prepare their music [for competitions] not in accordance with the composer's intentions so much as to suit the known 'vagaries and preferences' of the adjudicators for the time being.' The italics are ours. We do not believe that this charge can be substantiated by evidence. If it can be, then it must be easy to describe in writing the 'vagaries and preferences' of the best-known adjudicators. Will some of the conductors—if there be any in existence—who work on these lines be good enough to describe in detail the various ways of preparing a part-song (say Elgar's 'O happy eyes') to meet the different views of Dr. McNaught, Dr. Walford Davies, Mr. Granville Bantock, and Mr. Harry Evans? We shall be glad to endeavour to find space to print such illuminating communications. Will the writer in the Choir assist us in this quest?

We have received a letter from 'A Member of a County Competition Committee' in which the suggestion is made that as competitions lead to jealousy and implications on the fairness of adjudicators, it would be better for choirs, &c., to sing before competent judges, and be criticised without being placed or awarded prizes. But apart from many other considerations into which we cannot enter at present, we are unable to see how this plan would eliminate the original sin of jealousy or get rid of the unbelief in the wisdom of judges. On the whole, competition, with all its revelations of faulty human nature, is the best in the long run for the achievement of the object in view, namely, the education of competitors. If there were no such thing as jealousy apart from competitions we should be better inclined to consider our esteemed correspondent's suggestion.

We remind our readers that two of the most important competitive Festivals established in the country will be held shortly. The Morecambe event takes place on April 30, May 1 to 3, and the Midland Competition (Birmingham) on May 20 to 24. We give a special welcome to a new Festival to be held at Bolton on April 24, 25, and 26. Councillor T. H. Haythornthwaite, 19, Old Hall Street, Bolton, is one of the honorary secretaries.

LONDONDERRY FEIS.

February 25, 26, 27, 28, March 1.

General satisfaction was expressed with the outcome of this year's Feis. The syllabus provided nearly fifty competitions, entries were on the whole good, and the adjudicators, Mr. Ivor Atkins, Mr. E. T. Cook, and Mr. W. H. Reed, found much to praise in the performances submitted. We give below some of the chief results:

LADIES' CHOIRS.

- Tests: 'Sound sleep' (Vaughan Williams).
- 'The Pixies' (Coleridge-Taylor).

- 1st. Maiden City Choir (Mr. S. Smith).
- 2nd. Coleraine Madrigal Society (Mr. G. Norman Hay).

CHURCH CHOIRS (A).

- Tests: 'If ye then be risen with Christ' (Ivor Atkins).
- 'Lead, kindly Light' (Dykes).

Seven entries.

- 1st. M'Quiston Church, Belfast.
- 2nd. Church of the Good Shepherd, Sion Mills.
- 3rd. Ballycastle Church.

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

- Tests: 'The Wraith of Odin' (Elgar).
- 'Summer is gone' (Coleridge-Taylor).

- 1st. Maiden City.
- 2nd. Coleraine Madrigal.

SOLO COMPETITIONS.

- Soprano.—Miss Helen Kevin.
- Mezzo-soprano.—Miss Winifred Thompson.
- Contralto.—Miss D. McLaughlin.
- Tenor.—Mr. G. Herbert Reed.
- Baritone.—Mr. Gilbert Young.
- Bass.—Mr. J. Wylie.
- Ladies' Solo.—Miss H. W. Thompson.
- Men's Solo.—Mr. Harold Morrow.
- Irish Song.—Miss Gabrielle Doherty and Captain J. C. Herdman.
- Millar and Beatty Challenge Cup (for prize-winners at this and previous Festivals).—Miss Doherty.

There were also classes for school and other juvenile choirs, action-songs, chamber-music, &c. At the final concert there was a 'Gilbert and Sullivan' competition in costume, judged by the audience.

THE SOUTH-WEST LONDON FESTIVAL.

March 1 to 8 and 15.

This Festival, which is presided over by H.R.H. the Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, commenced on March 1 at Wandsworth Town Hall and concluded at the Crystal Palace on March 15. Two concerts by first prize winners were given, at which large audiences attended. The adjudicators were Dr. Alderson, Mr. Henry Bird, Dr. C. J. Frost, Mr. Walter Ford, Mr. Alfred Gibson, Mr. Herbert Hodge, Herr Hans Neumann, Mr. Dan Price, and Rev. H. T. Spencer. The competitions were keen and the standard well maintained. The entries numbered 725, and although so large, could have been doubled if simpler tests had been imposed and the ideal lowered; but the Committee steadfastly set their face against the inclusion of anything not of the highest order. It is gratifying to note the growing popularity of this Competitive Festival, and the genuine interest of the outside public in its work and aims. The closing concerts were the crowning successes of the series. At the afternoon performance Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Albany distributed the prizes, and her gracious manner won the hearts of all. There were also present Lady Katharine Meade, Lady Kirk, Sir William Lancaster, and the Hon. Lionel St. Aubyn. At the final concert the same evening Sir Arthur and Lady Holland distributed the awards. Special reference is due to the Rugby male-voice choir, who sang with remarkable skill and precision. Mr. George K. Stratton (violinist) also gained high commendation.

Soprano.—Lily Marston.

Mezzo-soprano.—Doris Goodwin.

Contralto solo.—Beatrice V. Betts.

Baritone.—Reginald Yates.

Tenor.—'Come, gentle sleep' (Sullivan).—William Groves.

The 'Kimber' Shield.—'Charm me asleep' (Leslie).—Essendine Choir (as above).

Dr. Huntley and Dr. Abernethy awarded the Trinity College Scholarship (£9 gr.) to the soprano vocalist, Miss Lily Marston.

STRATFORD AND EAST LONDON FESTIVAL.

March 1 to 10.

This old-established event continues to flourish, although this year there was a set-back. The entries were not very strong in choral Societies, as will be seen from the following statement: Local Choral Societies (2); Open Class Choral Societies (2); Small Choral Societies (2); total (6). Besides these there were Church Choirs (4); Men's-Voice Choirs (3). There were no entries for female-voice choirs, except in the form of Girls' Clubs (4). There can be no question that Stratford has produced remarkable school-choir results, but surely the naive claim made in the programme that East London choirs generally—and junior choirs in particular—exhibit 'far, far away the best singing' to be heard in this country, must be taken cum grano salis. Fifty-two Junior Choirs were heard at Stratford on this occasion. This is a splendid record. The pianoforte sections, too, were undoubtedly unique and wonderful in their scope and results. Solo-singing, again, is a successful section. We give below a summary of the chief results.

PIANOFORTE (Gold Medal Class). Nine entries.

Test: Scherzo (Brahms).

1st. Miss Dorothy Marshall, Stratford.

2nd. Miss Elsie Gregory.

Seniors (19 years and upwards). Twenty-two entries.

2nd. Miss E. Virginia Saunders-Jacobs.

VIOLIN (ages 15 and upwards).

Preliminary, 13 entries; final, 3 entries.

Test: Ballade in C minor (S. Coleridge-Taylor).

1st. Miss Ada M. Frenkel.

2nd. Miss Thurza E. M. Searle.

VOCAL SOLOS.

Gold Medal Class (open only to previous prize-winners).

Soprano. Nine entries.

Test: 'Lord of our chosen race,' from 'Ivanhoe' (Sullivan).

1st. Miss Stella Farmer.

Gold Medal Class. Mezzo-soprano. Six entries.

Test: Recit. and air, 'O love, from thy power,' from 'Samson and Delilah' (C. Saint-Saëns).

1st. Miss Elsie Gough.

Soprano (1st song). Twenty-two entries.

Test: 'Where daffodils grow' (Elsie E. Horne).

1st. Miss Marjorie Bowen.

1st. Miss Marie Smith.

Contralto. Eleven entries.

Test: 'By the bivouac's fitful flame' (Hamilton)

1st. Miss Muriel MacGregor.

Tenor. Nine entries.

Test: 'Dreamland' (Hamish MacCunn).

1st. Mr. W. Roseveare.

Baritone. Eight entries.

Test: 'I hope, the hornblower' (John Ireland).

1st. Mr. Fred Stanley, Stratford.

Baritone (final). Three entries.

Test: 'The tourney' (Healey Willan).

1st. Mr. R. Hopkins.

Bass. Ten entries.

Test: 'Sir Nigel's song' (Monk Gould).

1st. Mr. F. W. Busby.

Girls' Solo Singing. Thirty-seven entries.

Test: The nightingale of Lincoln's Inn' (Herbert Oliver).

1st. Miss Nellie Norman.

Boys' Solo Singing. Twenty-one entries.

Test: 'O, bid your faithful Ariel fly' (S. Linley).

1st. Master John Bartindale.

ADULT CHOIRS.

Choral Societies. Two entries.

Tests: 'Evening scene' (Edward Elgar).

'Music, when soft voices die' (Granville Bantock).

1st. Essendine Choir, Paddington (Mr. W. Kendall).

Men's Choir. Three entries.

Tests: 'Song of the Bards' (Julius Harrison).

'Ward, the Pirate' (arr. by R. Vaughan Williams).

1st. Woodford Male-Voice Glee Singers (Mr. W. H. Friend).

(Mr. F. E. Wilson).

The adjudicators were Messrs. James Bates, Oscar Beringer, Frederick Corder, Allen Gill, Dr. H. A. Harding, F. C. Field Hyde, Hermann Klein, Wesley Mills, George Oakey, Arthur W. Payne, Daniel Price, Charles F. Reddie, Dr. H. W. Richards, and Mrs. Louisa Walker.

For School Results see SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW.

CARLISLE.—March 3, 4, 5.

Throughout this Festival the support of both competitors and audiences was satisfactory. The test-pieces represented on the whole the highest standard of difficulty that choirs and soloists in the neighbourhood have yet had to encounter, and some of the performances were below requirements; but such stiff schooling will bear fruit in the end. Mr. Harry Evans, who adjudicated, made the chief awards as given below.

CHILDREN'S COMPETITIONS.

Sunday School and other Choirs.

1st. Upperby (Miss A. Mann).

Village Day School Choirs.

1st. Keswick (Miss Helen Marshall).

2nd. St. Aidan's (Mr. J. Routledge).

Day School Choirs (Challenge Shield Class).

1st. Goodwin Boys (Mr. W. H. Reid).

2nd. Robert Ferguson Memorial (Miss R. Bigg).

Village Choirs (Challenge Shield Class).

1st. Carleton C.E. (Miss N. B. Archer).

2nd. Dovenby Voluntary School (Mr. T. L. Hayston).

Trio for equal voices (Challenge Shield Class).

1st. Goodwin Boys.

2nd. Robert Ferguson.

Sight-tests, with separate awards, were also imposed in several of the above classes. The children's programme ended with a combined performance, under Mr. Evans's direction, of the cantata, 'Mice in Council,' by W. McNaught.

BUSINESS CHOIRS, ETC.

Girls' Choirs.

One entry, Charlotte Street Young Women's Mutual (Mrs. Creighton).

Lads' Choirs.

1st. St. Aidan's Young Men's Club (Mr. J. Routledge).

1st. Carlisle Madrigal.

2nd. Carloli.

At the final concert the feature of the evening was a performance of Bach's 'Sleepers, awake' by a choir of 309, under the direction of Mr. Evans.

FIFE.—March 7, 8.

The most satisfactory feature of the third Fife Musical Festival, held at St. Andrews, was the entry list in the juvenile classes. There were four competitions in this section, the 1st prizes being won as follows: Scotch songs, Wormit (Mr. D. Allison); English folk-songs, Lundin Mill (Mr. T. A. Maxwell); Two-part song, Ferry-Port-on-Craig (Mr. R. Wedderspoon); Psalm-tune, Colinsburgh (Mr. T. Clark). Only two choral Societies—Cupar Choral Union (Mr. J. W. Cooper) and Newport Choral Society (Mr. R. Scott)—entered in the various classes provided; for obtaining the highest aggregate marks Newport were awarded the Wakefield Memorial Medal. In the Church Choir section, in which only Ferry-Port-on-Craig (Mr. R. Wedderspoon) and St. Andrews Martyrs' United Free Church (Miss E. A. Wallace) entered, the chief prize was won by the latter choir. The adjudicators were Dr. R. Vaughan Williams and Mr. Frederick Keel. The tests were admirably, if rather ambitiously, chosen. In the adult classes they included a chorus from Bach's 'O Light everlasting,' Morley's 'April is in my mistress' face,' Elgar's 'Evening scene,' Vaughan Williams's 'Sound sleep,' and Wesley's 'The Lord hath been mindful.'

MANCHESTER TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

March 8.

The thirteenth Annual Manchester District Tonic Sol-fa Festival, held under the auspices of the Salford Municipal Entertainments Committee, and organized by the Manchester and District Tonic Sol-fa Association, again presented a full day's programme. So numerous were the entries in the various choirs that the adjudicator, Mr. Harry Evans, was busily employed from 10 a.m. till 9 p.m. in judging the 113 aspiring juvenile soloists, twenty-three pairs of duettists, and ten school choirs which had entered.

Ten choirs competed for the Alderman Keevney Challenge Shield, singing Coleridge-Taylor's 'Viking song' (unaccompanied), and a two-part sight-test. The results were as follows:

	Test-piece.	Sight-test.	Total.
1st. Grecian Street Council School, Salford (Mr. G. S. Smith)	58	...	38 = 96
2nd. Tootal Road Council School, Salford (Mr. J. E. Davies)	54	...	36 = 90

The following were the test-pieces and chief prize-winners in the other classes:

Junior Boys' Solo.—'The primrose' (Randegger), W. Shaw (Grecian Street).

Junior Girls' Solo.—'Alpine song' (J. Ireland), Bessie Evans (Longsight).

Senior Boys' Solo.—'Where'er you walk' (Handel), Frederick Walton (Moseley Road).

Senior Girls' Solo.—'Daybreak' (F. N. Lohr), Connie Welsh (Grecian Street).

Duet Competition.—'Oh! the summer' (S. Coleridge-Taylor), Mary Irving and Edith Whittaker (Longsight).

Individual Ear-test Competition.—Elsie Boardman (Grecian Street).

WANSBECK (MORPETH).

March 14, 15.

On this occasion Dr. A. H. Brewer adjudicated. The chief awards were as follows:

SCHOOLS (attendance under 100).

Tests: 'You are old, father William' (McDonald).
'Cradle-song' (Brahms).

- 1st. Belsay (Mr. McFirth).
2nd. Netherwitton (Miss Temple).

SCHOOLS (attendance over 100).

Tests: 'Cradle-song' (Cornelius).
'Oh! the summer' (Coleridge-Taylor).

- 1st. Morpeth C.S. (Miss Forster).
2nd. Pegswood (Mr. W. C. Atkinson).

VILLAGE CHORAL SOCIETIES.

Test: 'From Oberon in Fairyland' (Stevens).

- 1st. Longframlington.
Test: Madrigal: 'When flow'ry meadows' (Palestrina).
1st. Bedlington.

CHORAL SOCIETIES (Open Class).

Tests: 'Spring returns' (Luca Marenzio).
'Evening scene' (Elgar).

- 1st. Ashington.
2nd. Felton.

There were also competitions for Church and Chapel Choirs (1st, Netherwitton), male-voice choirs (1st, Felton) and female-voice choirs (1st, Ashington). The proceedings concluded with a performance of Macfarren's 'May-day,' under Lieut.-Col. Orde's conductorship.

CHILDREN'S CHOIRS (age under 18).

Tests: 'In Mary's garden' (E. M. Boyce).
'How merrily we live' (Este).

- 1st. Morpeth.
2nd. Netherwitton.

BLACKPOOL.—October 13-18.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

The next Blackpool Festival, some particulars of which are just available, will occupy the whole of the week October 13-18. Many eminent conductors, critics, and performers have accepted invitations to adjudicate, including Mr. Michael Balling (conductor of the Hallé Orchestra); Dr. Richard R. Terry (Westminster Roman Catholic Cathedral); Mr. J. A. Rodgers (Sheffield Festival); and Dr. McNaught, who will act in this capacity on October 18. Madame Marie Brema, Madame Edith Hands, Miss Fillinger, Dr. McNaught, Messrs. Frederic Austin, Hermann Klein, R. J. Forbes, F. Bonavia, W. Granger, and others, will take charge also of various classes during the week.

Whilst retaining the attractive feature of the Rose Bowl in the vocal solo classes, determined efforts appear to have been made to put this award on a sounder artistic basis. Operatic arias have been placed in classes by themselves, along with duets and quartets in costume, these having been chosen this year from Puccini's 'La Bohème,' and will have to be memorized. Thus simplified, the solo classes will be subdivided into lyrical and dramatic, the music being chosen from lieder and art-songs only. Berlioz's 'L'Absence,' Brahms's 'Mainacht,' Bach's 'Hebt euer Haupt empor,' and Strauss's 'Hymnus' come in the former division, the dramatic songs being Max Bruch's 'Ave Maria' (from 'Feuerkreuz'), Bantock's 'Sappho' and 'Peristaltic Fancies' cycles, and Hugo Wolf's 'Prometheus.' Two rose bowls will be awarded to the best lyrical and best dramatic singer, the difficult task of decision being entrusted to Madame Marie Brema. The selection of so eminent a singer for this purpose will certainly enhance the value of this feature of the Festival. The music on the closing day as usual promises several interesting novelties. In the principal male-voice class one of Bantock's Greek tragedy choruses must be prepared, as well as Brahms's 'Alt-Rhapsodie' (now obtainable in a cheap edition), which is the chief work. Choirs must bring their own contralto soloist (a special prize going to the best singer of the solo portion), and the three best choirs are to give a joint rendering in the evening under a conductor and contralto soloist provided by the Executive, the work being performed with pianoforte accompaniment, a noble climax to the week's work being thus provided. In the female-voice class a new and hitherto unperformed motif of Berlioz, and a recently-composed setting by Julius Harrison of Shelley's 'Music, when soft voices die,' are the selected tests, both in six-part harmony. The Challenge Shield mixed-voice choirs will gain acquaintance with Hugo Wolf's fine dramatic choral ballad, 'Der Feuer-reiter,' never before accessible in an English version, although Wolf's solo setting of the same Mörike ballad is occasionally performed at lieder recitals. In addition there will be Miss Ethel Smyth's setting of Dante Rossetti's sonnet 'Sleepless dreams,' and Marenzio's six-part madrigal, 'Cedan l'Antiche,' specially issued in an English garb, thanks to the researches of that great madrigalian authority, Lionel Benson. Another Italian madrigal, Palestrina's 'When from the realm supernal,' will be studied by the smaller mixed-voice choirs, along with a finely-imaginative setting by a South Wales critic-composer, Cyril Jenkins, of verses written by Samuel Langford, entitled, 'A hymn to the soul.' Mr. Balling will hear the orchestras in Cornelius's 'Barber of Bagdad' overture, and Ernest Austin's string orchestral Variations on the old tune 'The Vicar of Bray.'

A competitive musical Festival for boys and girls under sixteen years of age will be one of the features of the Children's Welfare Exhibition, promoted by the Daily News and Leader, to be opened in the Rusholme Exhibition Buildings, Manchester, on May-Day. Beginning on May 5, the Festival will continue each day until the 17th, when it will be wound up by a concert. Thirty-nine competitions, divided into three sections—choral classes, vocal solo classes, and instrumental classes—are announced.

The competition for the Smith-Dorrien Cup, organized by the Naval and Military Musical Union, was held at Aldershot on March 8. The 'March of the Men of Harlech' and Doring's 'Far down the green valley' were the tests, which choirs of eight to twelve voices were called upon to sing, and the result was as follows: 1st, Somerset Light Infantry; 2nd, Welsh Regiment; 3rd, Twelfth Brigade Royal Field Artillery. There were six entries. Dr. Percy Buck adjudicated.

How to Save Time in Learning to Play at Sight.

Instead of spending 3 hours a day for 6 days a week for 52 weeks a year for 3 or 4 years in order to acquire the ability to play your new music at first sight, you can acquire a much greater proficiency in 3 months with less than half-an-hour's daily practice. This is possible only by the aid of The Ehremayer System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing.

All Pianists or Students who find playing at sight their chief stumbling block should send at once for the free booklet explaining the simple but strictly scientific methods adopted. Hundreds of pupils who have taken the Course enthusiastically praise the System.

BOSWORTH EDITION.

"THE LYRIC ORGANIST."

A COLLECTION OF

Easy Melodious Pieces for the Organ,

EDITED AND ARRANGED BY

E. STANLEY ROPER,

MUS.BAC.

In Two Volumes, each 1s. 6d.

IN this Edition the Editor has kept before him the resources of a "two-manual" instrument only. While it is hoped, therefore, that the directions for registration may be found serviceable in such circumstances, it is recommended that on a larger instrument the items be made even more interesting. In such cases the choir and solo organs should be freely employed, and the registration suggested may then be regarded as supplying but a general idea of the composer's intentions.

Among the items contained are the following:—

SLUMBER SONG (Squire)	PLAINTE (Teller)
BRIDAL SONG (Jensen)	PLAINS OF PEACE (Barnard)
VISION (Byford)	TOCCATA (Crawford)

And many other favourite copyright numbers.

Richard Wagner

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

MAY 1, 1913.

THE CENTENARY OF THE BIRTH OF RICHARD WAGNER.

William Richard Wagner was born at Leipsic on May 22, 1813. He died at Venice on February 13, 1883, and was buried at Bayreuth.

Whatever acute differences of opinion Wagner's music aroused during his lifetime, there is now throughout the civilized world a wide and deep appreciation of his colossal achievements. As other great composers had done before him, Wagner compelled musical humanity by the force of his genius to accept his idioms. It is the sense of this formative influence of an original thinker that induces many critics to hesitate to condemn positively the Scriabins and Schönbergs who are to-day making a new and bewildering appeal to our conventional brains.

This year being the centenary of the great musician's birth, we propose to discuss in the light of present-day developments and views, some of the important considerations that arise out of his theories and works. Already have we printed a long article on 'Wagner and super-Wagner,' by Mr. Ernest Newman (February), and one on 'The Rhythmic Weakness of Wagner,' by Mr. Robert Ralph (April). A further article by Mr. Newman appears in our present issue.

The following is a list of the operatic works composed by Wagner by which he is chiefly known:

- Rienzi, 1838-1840.
- Die Fliegende Holländer, 1840-1841.
- Tannhäuser, 1842-1845.
- Lohengrin, 1846-1848.
- Das Rheingold, 1853-1854.
- Die Walküre, 1854-1856.
- Tristan und Isolde, 1857-1859.
- Siegfried, begun 1857 and completed in 1871.
- Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, 1862-1867.
- Götterdämmerung, 1870-1874.
- Parsifal, 1877-1882.

The first London performance of 'Tannhäuser' was given at Covent Garden in 1876, but the Overture was performed in this country for the first time by the New Philharmonic Society (London) in 1854.

We have thought it appropriate on this occasion to renew the portrait of Wagner which was given with our September, 1906, issue.

WAGNER'S PROSE WORKS.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

It is rather curious that among the many plans for celebrating the centenary of Wagner, no one has thought of bringing out a popular working edition of the best of his prose works.

As a writer he is still singularly little known in this country. For this the peculiar quality of most of the translations is largely responsible. They convert his German, which is often clumsy and tortuous enough to begin with, into a curious sort of pseudo-Teutonic English that no one ever talked or wrote before or since; and it is hardly astonishing that people who have broken a tooth or two on one of these very tough nuts should shy at tackling the remainder.

There is, too, so much dead matter in the twelve volumes of Wagner's prose and verse that it would not repay anyone except those who were studying him for literary purposes to read them all through. But a very useful and interesting selection might be made that would compress into a couple of moderate-sized volumes the bulk of the prose works that are likely to keep the breath of life in them. Some of the writings would be all the better for a drastic curtailment or compression; it would be possible, for example, to condense the essential argument of 'Opera and Drama' into about half its present bulk. But as this, the longest of Wagner's theoretical writings, now exists not only in Mr. Ashton Ellis's translation but in the very useful working edition of Mr. Edwin Evans, there is no necessity for a further issue of it even in a summarised form. But some publisher would be doing the musical world a real service by bringing out a readable translation of some of the remainder of Wagner's prose works. Very few of them, I think, will live except those that are concerned more or less directly with music and himself. There is no reason for reprinting that portion of a musician's prose works in which he is most obviously straying beyond his own field — sociological works that have not commended themselves to sociologists, historical works that have been passed over in stony silence by historians, political screeds that mean even less now than they did when they were uttered, and metaphysical speculations that have long since had their day. The only Wagner the world will care for fifty years hence is the Wagner who consciously made his life one of the most dazzling of romances, and the Wagner of the music-dramas. An almost ideal biography of the man would be a collection of his letters grouped in chronological order. And as for Wagner the musician and dramatist, we really need, for ordinary purposes, only so much of the prose works as will help us to a better insight into the workings of his mind and a better understanding of the course of his development. His lectures to the Germans, his facile nonsense about the French, his theories of food and of 'redemption,' all this can now be allowed to go quietly along the primrose path to the everlasting bonfire, along with preposterous dissertations like the essay on the 'Wibelungen.' The ideal selection would begin with the 'Autobiographical Sketch' (1842), and work up through the early essay on 'The Overture' (1841), 'Art and Revolution' (1849), 'The Art-work of the future' (1850), the 'Communication to my Friends' (1851), the article on 'Liszt's Symphonic Poems' (1857), the 'Zukunftsmusik' (1861), and the 'Destiny of Opera' (1871), to the writings of the last years—'Actors and Singers' (1872), 'On Poetry and Composition' (1879), 'On Operatic Poetry and Composition' (1879), and 'The Application of Music to the Drama' (1879). These works would give a continuous picture of his development to full consciousness of himself as dramatist and musician.

The 'Beethoven' (1870) would show in its fullest form his expansion of the Schopenhauerian theory of the nature of music: while his often penetrating and always interesting judgments upon certain of his contemporaries would be seen in curtailed versions of the articles on Auber, Spontini, and others. The selection could be completed with a few of his 'explanatory programmes' to his own works and those of others, and the fascinating treatise on 'Conducting'; and altogether it would give, I imagine, the ordinary student of Wagner all he needs to know of him.

It is a pity that Wagner's prose style altered so much for the worse as he grew older.* In his young days he wrote in a manner that won the admiration of exacting critics like Heine and Berlioz—lightly, brightly, and with a vein of humour running through his arguments. His very earliest work is mostly interesting now only in that it confirms the picture he gives of himself in the 'Autobiographical Sketch,' the 'Communication to my Friends,' and 'Mein Leben,' as a very eager young spirit quite unconscious of any definite goal in life or art, and hovering uncertainly in his musical tastes between Beethoven, Weber, and the French and Italian schools. The journalistic work he did in Paris was for the most part merely good pot-boiling: but two essays of that period are specially worth preserving,—the delicious article on the Paris performance of 'Der Freischütz,'† with its really admirable banter of the Paris Opéra, and the article on 'The Overture,' in which we have in embryo—in 1841—many of the ideas as to the relations between poetry and music that Wagner afterwards worked out in such copious detail in 'Opera and Drama,' and other works. It is one of the most luminous of all his articles, and one that no student of musical æsthetics should fail to read; it shows us Wagner slowly feeling his way—before the 'Flying Dutchman' was completed—to the free emotional forms of his maturer work. Already there is the striking insight into the soul of Beethoven's music that makes Wagner's later writings upon him so impressive; and several of the ideas of this youthful essay have been reproduced in substance and almost in phraseology in the great treatise of thirty years later on Beethoven—notably the passage in which it is contended that the 'Leonora' No. 3 Overture is a better because a more concise drama than the whole of the rest of the opera.

After the 'Autobiographical Sketch' which he wrote on leaving Paris in 1842 to settle at Dresden, he wrote practically no prose till 1848; but just as his brain was still maturing musically between the completion of 'Lohengrin' in 1848 and the commencement of the 'Rhinegold' in 1853, though he actually wrote no musical work during all that time, so between 1842 and 1848, though he published virtually no prose, his ideas on musical æsthetics were all the while ripening. It may be that his official duties at Dresden, together with the composition of 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin,' left him little time for theoretical work; but in 1848 he had evidently come to the first great crisis in his growth. He had conceived the idea of an opera on the subject of 'Siegfried's Death,' and with it he had, unconsciously at first, turned his back for ever on the old world of opera and opera houses. His political activities during the ferment of 1848 and 1849 were probably only a by-product of a general restlessness and hunger of the mind at this time. He put his music-paper away, as we have seen, for five or six years, and both at Dresden and in his Swiss solitude tried to take his bearings in art in general and music in particular. His seething brain was always a little too full for comfort: and the period of 1848 to 1852 was one in which he worked out in seizable form the thousand ideas that had been obsessing him since 1842, and daily becoming more clamorous for expression. The thoughtless old charge against him was that he worked out a theory and then wrote operas to demonstrate it. The truth was that 'Tristan' and the 'Ring' and 'Parsifal' were within him from his youngest manhood, as the oak is in the acorn. Wagner was one of the men who assimilate everything from life without it altering a fibre of their native personality, or deflecting them an inch from their primal bias. Some natures grow by accretion—what is taken in from the outside can profoundly modify the original tissue, and the final man is the balance struck between what he was in himself and what came to him from the outside. With others, no amount of outside influence can alter one jot of the original nature. Wagner was one of these: he was predestined to do certain work, and all his music and all his prose was simply the slow discovery of himself, as the full-grown oak is the acorn's discovery of itself.

This diagnosis of him explains his unshakeable confidence in himself, his intolerance of contrary opinion, his inability to grant the possible existence for others of anything that did not exist for him, and the fact that once he had found his own compass he steered by it to the end of his days. The musical writings of the last three or four years of his life, though they are more lucid in style and more concise in argument than those of thirty years before, are yet only restatements or slight

* It became clearer again in his latest years.

† It appeared in the Dresden Abend-Zeitung in July, 1841, and was, of course, written after the performance. The other article, in the Gazette Musicale for May, was intended to prepare the Parisian public for the production.
